Many Edison Offerings of Merit

Old Success Revived

CLEEK, of Scotland Yard, solves "The Mystery of the Lost Stradivarius," in Edison's one reel detective story of this name to be released on July 28.

As with many of the other releases of the "Cleek" series the story requires especially made settings, such as paneled walls, secret wire connections, etc. As Cleek, Ben Wilson represents the unassuming, scientific type of detective, who works on the theory of deductions rather than the suspicions aroused by circumstance.

In the gradual development of the mystery one is led to suspect that Vera North, an entirely innocent party, is either directly guilty or a party before the fact, in the opening and robbing of the safe of Sascha Boronoff. The climax comes when Cleek, after making observations, reveals a secret compartment in the wall in which Boronoff lies bound and gagged. Miss North is cleared of suspicion and the servant, Paradine, and Monsieur Mentone taken into custody for the crime.

SEVERAL years ago a one reel drama, "Laddie," was released by the Edison company. This subject has been reproduced, lengthened, and improved upon in the two reel release of July 24 under the same title.

The story is a pathetic one of a successful young doctor who realizes that his aged mother's style and dress are "behind the times," and feels rather ashamed and humiliated because of it. The deep, maternal love and self-sacrificing spirit which actuates the mother to leave when she sees she is not wanted, appeals to a person in that one spot which is seldom laid open to another's confidence.

Mrs. Carter's only son, John or Laddie, gets an opportunity to enter college and study medicine.

One of the places where they laugh in Edison's "Something to a Door."

Denying herself the only comfort of her widowhood, Mrs. Carter sends John away to school.

Fifteen years later the Carter residence is sold and Mrs. Carter forced to vacate. She decides to go to Laddie, who is now a successful doctor in the city. Glad to see his mother but ashamed of her countrified clothes and embarrassed manner, Laddie does not reveal her identity to his servants. Violet Meredith, Laddie's fiancee, calls on him. Mrs. Carter enters the room and Violet is hurriedly escorted out of it without being introduced. This arouses the suspicion in Mrs. Carter's mind that she is in the way, and explains Laddie's queer attitude which she had before overlooked as a professional peculiarity.

That night she leaves and is found the next day by Violet huddled in the shelter of a building, weak from exposure. Not recognizing her, Violet has her taken to a hospital and summons Laddie to take care of her.

In the meantime, when Laddie discovers that his mother has left he realizes that she is dearest of all to him and hurries out in search of her, but without success. In answer to Violet's call he goes to the hospital and finds his new patient to be his mother. A tearful meeting takes place, misunderstandings are straightened out, and happy in the restoration of her son's love and affection, Mrs. Carter succumbs to the illness contracted in her recent exposure.

JULY 22 is the day announced for the release of the Edison split reel comedies, "A Deal in Statuary," and "His Wife's Burglar." They balance a reel perfectly, both containing the funniest angles of unplanned situations, and both are by Charles M. Seay. They are exactly the kind of comedies to take off the serious edge and relieve the pent-up feelings aroused by tragic drama.

"A Deal in Statuary" is the story of a young sculpturist's attempt to get money from his rich aunt by powdering two of his servants and representing them as statues made by him. A mischievous boy and a pin upset his chances until he finally is successful in finishing one himself, whereupon his aunt rewards him with $5,000.

"His Wife's Burglar" turns out to be Mrs. Smith's husband, who has placed a dummy under the bed to scare her and then, after she has called the police, crawls under himself to get his glasses. After his explanation at the station Mrs. Smith leads home her life-mate and leaves the policemen laughing in anticipation of Mr. Smith's chastisement.

HUMOROUS situations aplenty are found in Edison's comedy release of July 29, "Something to a Door." The complications in the story are the most natural results of the enthusiasm with which two young people love and the hatred which the girl's father bears for her suitor.

Arthur Houseman and Elsie MacLeod are the principal fun-makers in this one reel of mirth.

The story centers about Jim Ferris' love for Bessie Hammond, of which Papa Hammond is aware and to which he is greatly opposed.

One night, after forbidding Bessie to receive Ferris, Mr. Hammond is called away on business and Bessie promptly calls up Jim and invites him over. His overcoat at the tailor's, Ferris takes his roommate's new coat. Mr. Hammond's unexpected return causes Jim to take refuge behind the piano and to forcibly realize that he is to be there indefinitely when Mr. Hammond sits down to read, after sending Bessie upstairs to bed. After three hours of reading and dozing Mr. Hammond prepares to retire and Jim sneaks out. In closing the door, which has a catch-lock, Jim catches his coat and is seen on the porch by Mr. Hammond. He calls up the police and then notices that Jim has slipped out of his coat and is gone. He goes in pursuit and gets locked out himself. The police arrest the man on the porch. Ferris' explanation of the absence of his chum's coat causes him to scurry to the station to try and recover it. Jim hurries after him, and at the station meets Bessie who has come in behalf of her father. All things explained, Mr. Hammond is forced to admit his unreasonable persecution of Bessie's lover.

"THE TWO DOCTORS" will be released by the Edison studio on July 14. It is a light one-reel drama written by Charles M. Seay, well staged and directed and a little outside of the beaten path traversed by "the triangle." The triangle in this cast is not "that infernal one" that figures so prominently in divorce cases. Sally Crute, Augustus Phillips and Bob Manning are the principal characters.

Dr. Martin and Dr. Westerly are roommates at college, though of distinctly different temperaments. After graduation Martin takes up a practice in a small town, Homeville, and becomes known as a friend of the people. Westerly's practice is in a large city where his exorbitant prices and pirate-like methods make him rich.

A patient whom Westerly had refused to treat longer, because of her inability to pay, is sent to the country by some friends, and there comes under the care of Martin, whose skillful treatment and frequent admonitions to forget about the payment soon bring her back to health.

One day Martin is called to see a man who had accidentally shot himself while hunting. The new patient turns out to be Dr. Westerly. Martin has him taken to his own home and asks his former patient, Alice, to nurse him. Recognition is mutual. Duty compels both Martin and Alice to do their best for him. Westerley is soon able to leave. He offers Martin a chance to earn a very comfortable income in the city, but his offer is refused, as arrangements have already been made whereby Alice will become Mrs. Martin and a permanent resident of Homeville.

Powell a Railroader

Frank Powell, director for Pathe Freres, has had another thriller which ends with a question mark. The other day it was necessary to get a railroad scene to complete a picture upon which he was working. But none of your up-to-date road beds and locomotives. No siree! The scene demanded one of those old fashioned black noser types and so Mr. Powell whirled off seventy miles into the country to a jerk water station where such an engine was known to exist, still occasionally useful despite its age, but mostly filling the part of a good natured relic and curiosity.

Preliminary arrangements were made, and perched on the red-rusty cow catcher with his camera he "choo-chooed" laboriously still farther into the back woods. At twenty-eight miles from where he started and with nothing more exciting about them than an old yellow cow and her calf, Mr. Powell suddenly made the discovery that it was impossible to turn the old "'76er" around for the return trip.

Nothing could be done but to back up the whole twenty-eight miles, and so seated on the tail of the soft coal tender, with the click, click, click of the camera humming a merry tune in his ears, while the black soot and cinders trailed back and rapidly filled them. he crawled back to the pretty little country station and civilization. But half way back the regular, or irregular, fireman had to go help his mother-in-law catch the runaway family "Dobbin." The emergency of course, introduced Mr. Powell into the fine art of engine stoking. He finished the trip and the picture in "some style" he says, but does not hesitate to add that being a fireman is some job. While he feels that he is deserving of congratulations for having "busted into the railroad game somewhere near the bottom," he is not loath to add that he thinks its possibilities are not particularly attractive to the average moving picture director.

"Blue Knot, King of Polo"

A fascinating American topical with a strong dramatic tone. Elmer Boseke and his famous polo pony "Blue Knot," take part in the subject. Edward Coxen and George Field appear as brothers, rivals for the hand of the same woman. Coxen wins.

Biograph Kids Are Wonderful Girls

Chicago Exhibitor's Daughters

Flora Foster.

BILLY carried the box and Flora delivered the message. And afterward Mr. Sweeney explained that Billy and Flora were his conception of flowers and that when the business of convention week prevented his calling personally, to pay Chicago respects, he thought the nicest thing possible was to send Billy and Flora lovely peonies and kind regards.

So they came and Billy carried the box and Flora delivered the message—and that is typical of the lives of both the little girls. For Billy, so-named because she plays the role of boy so frequently, is the rugged strong-featured, strong-muscled one of the two, while Flora, two years older than Billy, is fragile and dainty and her features are delicately cast.

Flo.

Billy.

They are Biograph girls and have been with that company for five years. "The Biograph Kids" is the popular name for them, though now they are getting almost too old for that title. For Flora is sixteen and Billy is fourteen—but they look no more than twelve. Their last name is Foster and their father owns a picture theater in Chicago.

"—and Mr. Sweeney made him leave his theater and come on for convention week," said Flora, as she and Billy sat side by side in the Room of the Green Rug. "We hadn't seen him for a long while," she went on. "You see, we go to boarding school right near the Biograph studio and papa can't leave his business to come on and see us often."

"And we were so glad to see him," put in Billy, "and Mr. Sweeney," said both girls together. Their gray eyes smiled, their lips parted to show white, even teeth and Flora folded her hands in her lap and offered "Billy's real name is Edna."

Billy answered the turn of Flora's head with the explanation, "They always give me boy parts and I like them better than just being a girl. They got a series of boy pictures ready and asked me what name I wanted to have in them and I said 'Billy.' So the series was named 'The Adventures of Billy' and I've been called 'Billy' ever since that by everybody."

"In 'The Ragamuffin' she had to fight a boy," volunteered Flora.

"Of course it was all fixed for me to win, and I got a dollar extra," further explained Billy. "I love to play with boys and outside of school, I always do. I like base-ball and rugby."

"And she drives a big Packard," put in Flora. "She really is just like a boy. I can't do any of those boy things; I like to read and study and after school and when we're not working in pictures, I like to sew on the veranda or to practice singing."

"Flora likes songs like 'I Love You Truly,'" Billy said, and Flora smiled and admitted that she did.

"And Billy likes rag-time and takes dancing lessons. She's going to sign with the Metropolitan ballet. I never would be strong enough to dance like Billy does. My stage favorite is Maud Adams."

"And mine," said Billy, "is Blanche Sweet. We played in Mr. Griffith's company when he was at the Biograph and we like him ever so much. I played the little crippled girl in 'The Escape.' When Blanche Sweet was at the Biograph she used to bring me dolls and help me dress them."

"She was very nice to Billy," approved Flora. "We played with Harry Carey a great deal," she went on. "We think a great deal of Mr. Carey; he is charming." Billy nodded agreement and remembered,

"Both Flora and I played in 'Prince Charming' and Flora was in 'The Wedding Gown' and 'The District Attorney's Conscience' at the Reliance, and 'David Copperfield' at the Thanhouser studio."

"Yes, I was little David," Flora took up the story. "I like sad parts—Billy doesn't." Billy smiled her boyish smile and swung her heelless canvas-shod feet under her chair as though to show how much she didn't like sad parts.

"Billy was in a Reliance picture, too and we were in vaudeville for a little while; and all the rest of the time we have been with the Biograph company. Though I'm the older," Flora was inspired to add, "I'm not 'the boss.'" She smiled a gray-eyed smile at Billy who returned a twin one and the remark,

"Neither of us is 'boss,' but I guess I give in to Flora because she is the older."

"But we talk things over and come to an agreement always, so really there is no boss," Flora explained the sisterly situation. "Perhaps we agree so well because we are so different" she finished and as a new thought suggested itself, offered it with a smile, "Just feel Billy's muscle!"

It was a muscle that a boy of more than Billy's age would be proud of; round and hard as the proverbial rock.

And when they took leave in the interest of the Saturday half-holiday that remained to them, it was with equal refinement that their polite good-byes were said. Twin gray eyes smiled from underneath white summer-felt hats,—Flora's hat turned up, Billy's down —and the bobbed hair that curled up about the ears of each was of an identical golden tint.

And you knew that Mr. Sweeney's comparison of them to flowers, was entirely right.

Reporter Gets "Men Higher Up"

Almost every man thinks he can conduct a newspaper, a hotel or a theater, superior to the way in which it is handled on the average. They all look easy, but are in reality difficult, and the inner workings are but little understood by the general public. A cracking good play on a newspaper subject is a coming release of Selig's—"Reporter Jimmie Intervenes." In this vital, up-to-date document, Jimmie, a reportorial top-notcher, gets a line on a big franchise deal that is to be railroaded through the City Council. Through daring persistence and ingenuity he "gets the goods' on the councilman and the franchise-grabbers higher up, so that he wins "a scoop" for his paper, saves the taxpayers' money, saves the good name of the City Council, and wins the girl of his heart in one fell swoop. A thoroughly alert reporter can do these things. just as easy; at any rate Jimmie did with neatness and dispatch.

He wins the girl he loves.

Universal Forms New Rex Company

A new Rex company has been organized by the Universal at its West Coast Studios, Los Angeles, and to fill the roster the Universal has again drawn members of the legitimate drama into its fold, Elsie Jane Wilson and Rupert Julian being the players secured.

Mr. Julian is already known in pictures, having played heavy leads with the Smalley Rex company for some time. He is also well known on the legitimate. Miss Wilson, who is Mrs. Julian in private life, is well known before the footlights of the English provinces of Australia, New Zealand and Africa. During one season she played the woman in Robert Hilliard's performance of "A Fool There Was." Following that she toured the United States in the title role of Henry W. Savage's production of "Everywoman." Later, she was engaged by Manager Blackwell as star in Los Angeles Little Theater. When the Little Theater closed Miss Wilson took her first vacation in four years. For three months she kept house for her husband at his Hollywood bungalow. Finally she was successfully urged to accept a position with her husband as woman lead in the new Rex company.

Lasky Negative Vault

In connection with the new studios the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company contemplates building in the East, shortly, there will be an absolute fire proof, explosion proof, negative vault.

The vault will be composed of small separate vaults within, each negative being in a separate and distinct enclosure, which will have an outlet to the open air. A cooling plant will keep the air at fifty degrees Fahrenheit, permanently.

The separate vaults will be so constructed that if one were to be affected by combustion or fire, the damage would be confined to the one vault only, in that the individual outlets will carry off the gases and combustible air, so that even in the event of a fire, which is almost impossible, but one negative vault will be affected.

The plans for the negative vault, worked out by Charles De Soria and Oscar Apfel, when submitted by Mr. Lasky to Morris Rose, the prominent insurance man, were accepted by the latter as being as near a perfect receptacle for combustibles as had ever been conceived.

Lubin Actor Has Close Call

It would have been a realistic scene which might have been thrown on some motion picture after the players of the Lubin film company had gone to a swamp west of Point Pleasant, New Jersey, to secure a swamp scene had it not been that operators, actors, actresses and workmen were thrown into a state of consternation when George Trimble, the leading man in the troupe, began to sink into the soft loam of the swamp. While it ultimately proved humorous it came mighty close to costing Mr. Trimble his life, as it required the combined efforts of four men with a length of stout rope to keep him from disappearing under the surface.

The actors were ready for the scene, and the cameras were trained upon Mr. Trimble who was to have been shown sinking into the quagmire. Everyone thought it was fine until Mr. Trimble shouted an appeal for help, saying that he was powerless to keep himself from sinking into the swamp. A rope was hastily thrown over the limb of a nearby tree, and in this manner Mr. Trimble's 285 pounds were hoisted with difficulty to safety. Peter J. Lang, also a member of the troupe, who tips the scales at 250, narrowly escaped getting caught in the mire when he attempted to place the rope under Trimble's arms.

Thrilling Play of Political Crooks

Millionaire Foils Plot

FILLED with numerous thrills and characterized by settings and acting of a meritorious nature Essanay's "Night Hawks," which is booked for release on July 10, will undoubtedly prove one of the most popular melodramas seen on the screen for some time.

Francis X. Bushman, who is featured in the production, is ideally cast in the role of a millionaire who becomes involved in a plot laid by a band of political grafters and who is instrumental in foiling them, thereby winning the daughter of the man who has fallen victim of the gang. There is a large cast supporting Mr. Bushman and the acting of all is praiseworthy. Miss Ruth Stonehouse as the heroine puts feeling into her part and uses every thrilling situation she is placed in to the best advantage.

The action is fast and convincing and the interest is sustained up to the final fade out; Mr. Bushman and Miss Stonehouse putting on a very human little love scene at the close. The settings, most of which are interiors, range from scantily furnished rooms in a boarding house to the magnificent parlors in the homes of the wealthy district attorney and the young millionaire, and all succeed in creating the atmosphere which is desired. The exteriors, especially those showing the millionaire's adventures at night are decidedly artistic.

There are several places where mystery predominates all other points in the plot but no attempt is made to develop this. However, it fits gracefully into the general trend of the story, and lends spice to the plot.

The opening of the first reel shows Howard Varing, the district attorney, preparing to secure evidence which will convict a gang of political crooks who are operating in his city. The gang however have kept under cover, and despite the fact that Varing uses every possible means at his command, he can secure nothing that will place them behind the bars.

Wardell, the leader of the gang, learns through the daily papers of Varing's intentions and knows that sooner or later the attorney will secure the evidence he desires so he determines that the only thing to be done is to get him out of the way as soon as possible. He is conferring with two henchmen as to the best way to accomplish this end when Stone, another henchman, comes into the office to demand money for a former deal in which he had participated.

Busy planning the destruction of Varing, Wardell orders Stone from the office without paying him and when he refuses to go has him thrown out bodily. This angers Stone and he swears revenge. He determines to learn of the plan his former comrades are discussing and going into the room next door listens and watches through the key-hole.

He hears the details of the plot against the district attorney and hurries to Varing's office to tell him of it. Together they return to the rendezvous of the gang and there Varing himself hears the plotters. His temper gets the best of him and as a result they are discovered. A pistol battle follows and one of the henchmen drops to the floor, dead. Stone, who fired the fatal shot, is himself badly wounded but escapes. Varing is not so lucky and is caught by Wardell and the other henchman and accused of the murder of their pal. A policeman is called and both swear that the murder was deliberate so Varing is placed under arrest.

Stone rushes to the room of Kerns, his pal, where he falls unconscious. When he recovers he realizes that he is fatally wounded and that Varing will probably be accused of the murder of the henchman, so he writes two letters, one to Varing's daughter, Mildred, telling her that he fired the death-bringing shot and the other to Wardell, taunting him by saying he has been revenged. Kerns promises to deliver both the letters and Stone passes away.

Kerns delivers Stone's confession safely to Mildred and then goes to deliver Wardell's letter, but before he can get away from the rendezvous of the gang he is captured and forced to tell where he left the confession, which Stone also mentions in his letter to the leader of the gang. Learning that the success of their plan against the district attorney depends upon their securing Stone's confession they bind Kerns and set out for Varing's home.

Humphrey claims his reward.

About this time Humphrey, a young millionaire, leaves his home in his car to meet some friends in the country. Mildred finds herself alone in the house and hides the letter in a brass box for safe keeping. Wardell and his henchman come to the house and sneak in through an open window. They seize the girl and attempt to snatch the box from her but she escapes and flees through the back door.

Humphrey has become lost and is slowly driving along the road as she runs out. She appeals to him for protection and he gladly comes to her aid. The two ruffians dash up and in the mix-up that follows Wardell is knocked down by Humphrey, but his henchman snatches the box from Mildred and escapes.

Leaving Mildred with the fallen Wardell, the millionaire pursues the crook and finally overtakes him and brings the box back but allows the man to escape. When he reaches his auto, however, both Mildred and Wardell have disappeared. Being at a loss as to what course to follow he takes the box home where he is just examining it when he receives a telephone call from a woman, who says she is a friend of Mildred's and that the girl wants him to bring the box to her.

As a matter of precaution Humphrey leaves the box at home, but goes to the place he was directed. No sooner has he entered the house than he is knocked unconscious by Wardell and his henchman who, assisted by a woman accomplice, had telephoned for him. Seeing that he has not the box with him they rush to his home to try to find it.

As Humphrey slowly returns to consciousness, he hears the moans of a woman in the next room. The doors are locked and he is forced to swing from one window to another by means of the frame work of an awning. When he enters the room he finds Mildred bound and gagged, lying on a bed. She had been kidnapped by Wardell to remove all trace of his attempted robbery.

Together they make their way to Humphrey's automobile and rush towards his home, stopping to pick up some hunters who are returning from an early morning shoot. All make their way to the millionaire's mansion where they surprise the trio of crooks just as they find the box containing the confession.

The gang make a desperate effort to escape and Wardell succeeds in getting away in an automobile, only to be pursued and captured by Humphrey. The police are called and they are started on their way to prison.

The confession of Stone clears the name of Varing and when Humphrey and Mildred slyly appear before him and ask his consent to their marriage he gladly gives them his blessing.

The cast of the picture follows:

Prize Scenario Competition

Who can write the best American comedy for the screen?

This question is to be answered in the $1,750 prize scenario contest which is being conducted by the Chartered Theaters Corporation and a New York paper. Three prizes of $1,000, $500 and $250 respectively will be awarded to the writers who submit the three best stories, and practically the same conditions which existed in the recent competition for the best American picture drama will govern this contest.

The contest is open to all writers, the only persons being barred are those who are on the staffs of the paper and the film company which is offering the prizes. Young writers are encouraged to enter this competition as all scripts are submitted by number instead of name and all have an equal chance. The first contest brought forth three winners, none of whom had been writing a year.

Two or three reels is the length suggested by the judges in the present contest, quality rather than quantity influencing their decision.

The School and the Picture Theater

By Dr. Albert Shiels*

SOME OF DR. SHIEL'S STRIKING SENTENCES.

We have made wonderful strides in clean pictures. There is no country in the world that, from the moral standpoint, exhibits a grade of pictures as good as our own.

The superintendents, principals and teachers wield a tremendous influence—it is good business, therefore, as well as good policy and good citizenship, for you to keep in close touch with the schools, to consult them, to refer to them.

An investigation carried on in one city showed that out of 748 school children, 41 per cent of them preferred educational films, 30 per cent dramas, 27 per cent comedies, and just 2 per cent crime. Out of 3,000 children more than half attended a theater once a week or oftener. Only 10 per cent did not attend any.

The two factors of the two greatest educational forces in the world should get together. If the school teacher has not made advances to you, then you should make advances to him.

I SUPPOSE there is not a teacher, on his first view of motion pictures, but has thought at once of their possible educational value in the process of instruction. So his immediate idea naturally is to put motion pictures into the school where the educator may have exclusive control of the films and the methods of exhibiting them. There are many illustrations of this attempt to bring the motion picture into the school. The University of Wisconsin has a circulating library of motion pictures for schools. Missouri, Minnesota, Yale and Annapolis have introduced them. There are also many high schools throughout the country that use the pictures. In New York eleven elementary schools are now equipped, and the number will shortly be increased. The introduction of smaller projecting machines and non-inflammable films will facilitate this development. But this is all a very trifling contribution. Roll up the entire total and it is significant when compared with the daily output of 15,000 theaters throughout the country.

But from the educator's standpoint motion pictures in the schools cannot solve the educational problem. If we could equip all our schools properly, if we could select just the films we needed for geography, history, nature study and literature, if the authorities were able to furnish money enough to extend this method of education on a large scale, it would be true that on every afternoon and evening we should still find parents and children in the motion picture theater just as you find them now: they would be getting part of their education there just as they get other parts of it in the school, in the street and in the home. It is not strange, therefore, that the school people, knowing as they do how important these motion pictures are in the lives and development of children, should be anxious to know what is going on in your places. It is not even unnatural that they should be sometimes suspicious, even if unjustly so.

And we must remember that there is an educational—a psychological side as well. As exhibitors, you cannot reasonably be expected to discover reasons why a constant diet of motion pictures, even if morally unobjectionable, is not good for the intellectual stomachs of children. It would, however, be a wise thing for you to get the educators' point of view and to understand it.

I am, however, concerned this afternoon not with an analysis of the motion picture and its values, but with a more immediate and practical question, that of closer cooperation between the schools and the theater under existing conditions.

Up to a short time ago it was customary to abuse the motion picture theaters. If a boy stole a watch or robbed his parents, it was all duly laid at the door of the "movies." They were all described as vicious resorts without further appeal or investigation. Only recently I heard an educated woman state that they were among the worst features of our city. She confessed she had never been in such a theater. Up to two years ago, had you believed the newspapers, the place of the motion picture theater in a community was on a par with that of a low class saloon.

Three years of constant and consistent abuse had their natural fruits. Yet notwithstanding the fact that some unprincipled men went into the business and some low resorts were opened the motion picture theater survived. About the time that the regular theater people adapted the motion picture exhibition as one of their own activities, the newspapers took a new stand and gave the industry extensive and favorable advertising. Nevertheless, the old reputation, however unjust, cannot readily change. There are many people who yet look upon these places as vulgar and commonplace at best; and among them we may safely include a number who guide the fortunes of our schools. It is necessary to destroy the old reputation. This is not a matter of sentiment but of business. You need, therefore, the co-operation of schools for business reasons. Of course you may not agree with me and feel quite independent of schools and school people; yet it does seem to me—and I know something about schools and motion pictures—that it would be wise for you to keep the school people in mind.

If you have a place in operation, how should it be run? You know as well as I do the value of aisles a little wider than the law requires, of comfortable chairs, of proper lighting, of wide exits with doors opening outward, of exclusion of undesirable people; and any exhibitor who has had these things can tell you that a steady family trade of clean, decent people is a first-class investment. If a man is running this sort of a place, would it not be a good thing for him to ask the school people to visit it, to write them to see what he is doing, explain to them just the sort of show he is giving and the kind of audience he insists on having? You have in New York City an army of 21,000 teachers, and in the country about, another army of 500,000; those are armies worth enlisting in any good cause.

And you want the school people to understand that you not only obey the law regarding the admission of minors, but go beyond it if necessary. You are merchants, but you are citizens too, and you are going to support the schools by every means in your power. It is a bad thing to admit even a possible school pupil during school hours, even if he is above the age limit. It would be wise to let the neighboring school principals and teachers know how you feel about this: they are accustomed to abuse and much criticism from business men, but not to over-much active cooperation.

As motion pictures are run for revenue, like any business, it is a waste of time for educators or reformers to ask exhibitors to produce regularly educational or other like films if the other kind are more popular.

Therefore, while we would not be so foolish as to ask any business man to sacrifice income, it is fair to ask the exhibitors to make some inquiry into the type of pictures that pays best. To hear some manufacturers justify the kind of pictures they turn out, you would suppose that the American motion picture audience must be a vast aggregation of idiots or lunatics. Why not try to find out whether the public doesn't want something better than vulgar slapstick comedy, or actor cow-boys. The point I wish to make is that both manufacturers and exhibitors might give the public a better type of picture, and that exhibitors might try to have the better pictures shown, at least as an experiment. The experiment has been tried, especially in small towns, of having the motion picture in a school for a special occasion, and running the educational film, so-called—for pupils. I know of no reason why this experiment should not be extended; not as a favor or a gift, but as a pure business proposition; of course if the school people look on the motion theater as their natural enemy, or if the motion picture people are indifferent to any new possibilities, because they may be doing a remunerative business, nothing will be done. It takes sympathy, and industry, and brains to get co-operation, and those who get it are the big men with imagination.

The vaudeville of a cheap show cannot, usually, be of the character that commands high pay. Some vaudeville is pathetic; some is just hopelessly poor, but there is a third kind which will do more to hurt the motion picture business than any other thing that I know. We have made wonderful strides in clean pictures. There is no country in the world that, from the moral standpoint, exhibits a grade of pictures as good as our own. But if an exhibitor is going to be foolish enough to neutralize the harmless picture by objectionable vaudeville shows, he will be giving an added argument to the numerous company of ignorant and prejudiced people who are always finding fault with motion pictures and motion picture exhibitors.

And the same remark applies to signs and posters. We are getting out a better poster now, but there are still too many places that put up signs and posters at the front door more suited to a cheap Bowery show than a good motion picture theater.

I have mentioned some of the important phases of motion picture exhibits. Covering all of them, the one thought I wish to emphasize is this: in this country nothing has ever really had a permanent success which has not had the backing of the decent part of the community. Extreme fashions, indecent plays, suggestive novels, have all netted a little extra money to those who may have started the new movement, but the imitators and followers have eventually found these things to be losing propositions. You cannot make a permanent investment on any activity or amusement that caters to the lower tastes of a community. You may recall what Maeterlinck says, "It is the way in which our hours of freedom are spent that determines as much as war or labor, the moral worth of a nation."

Some years ago the motion picture business was threatened by the production of vicious films, and the Board of Censorship, through which the business was practically saved, was for a long time supported by manufacturers and exhibitors that they might be protected from their unworthy fellows.

There are two great institutions in society that stand for what is clean, wholesome and inspiring; the school and the church. The school has the allegiance and support of citizens. They believe in it. The superintendents, principals and teachers wield a tremendous influence, solely as that influence is devoted to the improvement of children. It is good business, therefore, and good policy as well as good citizenship for you to keep in close touch with the schools, to consult them, to refer to them. Of course you meet narrow, ignorant school people sometimes, just as sometimes you meet brutal, stupid, indifferent exhibitors—both are exceptional.

Go to the school people of your neighborhood. Tell them what you are trying to do. Invite them to see your show and make suggestions. Arrange at a minimum price an occasional educational exhibit without loss and possibly without profit. Ask for criticisms. Let the school people feel that you are thoroughly in agreement with them, that a motion picture show can be clean healthful and decent. Let them understand you propose to prove you have just such a show.

This brings up a second point. There are many people who have made actual studies. Have these been capitalized so that the picture trade knows the results? At a recent convention of the National Educational Associaion a state superintendent said that viewing of many motion pictures was a vicious thing for the emotional life of adolescents. Perhaps he is right—perhaps not, but as a contribution it ought to be collated so that a trade organization can get together all the facts or alleged facts, investigate them and be guided by them. Every big business has found that a little money spent in this way gives big dividends. There are many educators and psychologists whose opinion would be well worth while consulting.

Many of the investigations started by citizens' committees and reform societies should have been initiated by exhibitors, for it's an opportunity they should be first to seize. In Nebraska it is stated that 35% of the audience in motion picture places are under 15. What of it? It may mean something to you. South Bend, Indiana, citizens carried on an investigation among 748 school children and showed that 41% of them preferred educational films, 30% dramas, 27% comedies and just 2% crime. Yet some people seem to think that the nearer a picture can get to crime the better it will sell. In the same town, by the way, it was found that out of 3,000 school children, just half went to a motion picture theater once a week or oftener. Only 10% did not attend any. Do you wonder the school people are interested?

It might well be worth while for such exhibitors as are scientifically inclined to get a number of voluntary votes on the pictures they produce and have some clerk tabulate them for sustained periods. School people might well aid in this matter. What we need are more facts and figures on which to base a positive judgment.

The motion picture trade must come to understand—and I am speaking now quite as much for business as for education—that there is more to picture exhibitions than exchanges, rents and box receipts.

To begin with, there must be better appraisal of the educational values and disadvantages of the pictures we now produce. It is true that every picture is—whether for good or ill, an educational picture. Any teacher who has studied the question will note the educational values in dramas, stories, even in comedies. They are representations of foreign lands, customs and dress, there is play for moral forces. And there are few teachers but could point out the tremendous opportunity for development of geography, history, nature science, as yet scarcely touched. I can hear some one say, "There isn't any market for it,"—but wait a moment. As a matter of fact, what positive standards are there to show that the present types of pictures are the best sellers? How much is there of real knowledge and how much of wild chance? And if you, as exhibitors, know better types, to what degree do you control production? Is this a business in which the manufacturer consults his customers, or the customers take what they can get? If, as exhibitors, you could control production, what real knowledge have you of what the public wants except in terms of what you have given?

As a member of the Board of Censors, I am free to say that whether viewed from the standpoint of art, or consistent action, or taste, some of it is poor. The best that can be said of many of our pictures is that they are morally unobjectionable.

Now, in conclusion, motion pictures are a means of education. If the school teacher doesn't believe it he must be blind. If he is interested in his pupils—and every good teacher is—he wants to know that they are having a chance for development. He knows that the desire for amusement is a normal part of every healthy being. Therefore, if he can learn from you how many of his pupils become at one time or another your pupils, too, then he will be interested in what you have to teach them. Teaching is his profession, and though you have never looked upon it that way, it is the profession of exhibitors as well. The two members of this greatest of professions should get together and if the school teacher has not made advances to you, then you should make advances to him.

If in New York alone all the exhibitors and all the school people were working together with some understanding and respect for one another's work, do you realize that it would mean a constituency in New York City alone of just about a million young people?

And I leave, therefore, in the hope that there may be some men here who have thought out the possibilities of a clearing house for the trade that will capitalize facts, figures and opinions so as to protect the trade and improve it; men who have tried out the experiment of writing and talking to and working with the school people. All this may involve labor, thought, misunderstanding, and foolish suspicion; it may require some sustained effort, but when accomplished, whether from the standpoint of better teaching of children, or better sntadard of products or better business, the result will pay.

"Othello" Released Through General

George Kleine has announced that he will release "Othello" or "The Moor of Venice," the big Shakespearean production made under his direction in Venice, Italy, by the Photo Drama Company, through the General Film Company the week of July 6.

The picture is about five reels in length and was made in an environment which was in every way fitting for the reproduction of this divine tragedy.

Produces Real Old Time Melodrama

Cameo of Yellowstone

A REAL old fashioned melodrama with a regular hero, a dashing heroine and a black mustached villain will be the offering of the American Film Manufacturing Company on Monday, July 6, when "Cameo of the Yellowstone" will be released.

In "Cameo" the "Flying A" players return to the style of picture which made them famous, for it is a red-blooded western of the kind that stirs your blood, and thrills you through and through. A bold, bad cattle rustler, a part skillfully enacted by Jack Richardson, causes all the trouble and so makes the film possible. How this cattle rustler saw and rustled the stock from Colonel Houston's ranch, how he saw and fell in love with Hope, the colonel's daughter, how he was "cut out" and finally completely vanquished by Cameo, the cowboy hero of the story, and, finally, how he met an ignoble end at the hands of an Indian squaw to whom he had made love and then deserted, is all told within the two thousand feet of film.

Billy Garwood, as "Cameo," makes the cowpuncher hero a real rough-and-ready man of the West, and no girlie in the audience will ever blame Vivian Rich, as "Hope," for falling head over heels in love with him. The scenic backgrounds against which the story is told are fully up to the American standard, and one or two of them in particular are gems of the photographer's art. The view which we are given of the running fight between Hawkins and the pursuing cowboys is beautiful in the extreme and one keeps wishing and wishing that he may obtain another glimpse of that particular bit of mountain scenery.

Paecha, the squaw, returned to her people by Cameo.

As the story opens, Cameo, the cowpuncher hero of the tale, arrives at the settlement's lone drink emporium just in time to discover Paecha, a little Indian maid, being hurled ruthlessly to the floor by Hawkins, the bad man of the town, who objects to her following him about, even though he has encouraged her to love him.

Cameo tells Hawkins exactly what he thinks of him, then throws Paecha across his saddle pummel and rides off with her to the tepees of her tribe, which are pitched within walking distance of the settlement.

Only the interference of bystanders had prevented a shooting affray between Hawkins and Cameo in the saloon, but once Cameo has departed, Hawkins swears vengeance on him. While idling in the saloon Hawkins has discussed with his followers a plan for rustling some of the cattle owned by Colonel Houston. He believes it will be comparatively easy to make away with the cattle and then to establish an alibi by riding over to the colonel's house, while his men conduct the cattle to a safe hiding place.

The plan once agreed upon, Hawkins and his men hasten to put it into effect. They corner a bunch of cattle and drive them out of the Houston pasture, though from the brow of a distant hill Cameo has seen the whole proceeding. He at once sets out for the Houston ranch to give warning of the cattle rustlers, but arrives at the round-up camp only to discover that Hope has ridden off with Hawkins, Now, though Cameo suspects Hawkins of being mixed up in the cattle rustling he says nothing, but rides on in the expectation of overtaking Hope and her escort.

When Cameo reigns up in front of the Houston home he interrupts Hawkins in the very act of making love to Hope. Hope is naturally delighted over the appearance of her sweetheart—for she has learned to love Cameo — but Hawkins is more than ever chagrined to find himself playing second fiddle to the man who had so recently humiliated him.

Hawkins departs, but it is only to hide outside, where he plans on wreaking vengeance on Cameo when he leaves the Houston roof. As evening falls and the lamps are lighted, however, Hawkins is able to see Cameo through the window, holding Hope in a fond embrace. Angered beyond endurance at this sight, he draws his revolver and sends a bullet crashing through the window. The lamp is struck and extinguished and Cameo, warned of danger, sends Hope to another room while he hides behind the door, determined to have matters out with Hawkins.

Hawkins enters on tip-toe to learn if he has shot Cameo, and a grippingly tense scene ensues while one man stands one side of the door and the other, less than two inches away, on the other side of the same door. Fearing to come farther into the room, Hawkins finally backs out and then Cameo steps forth to capture him. A ray of light exposes the form of Cameo to his foe and a moment later Hawkins sends a bullet through the window and into his opponent's wrist. Cameo, though wounded, is about to dash out and settle scores once and for all with Hawkins, but Hope intervenes and finally persuades him, for his own good, not to kill Hawkins.

The bad man, realizing that the game is up for him, hastens forth to warn his rustler friends to drive the cattle out of the county, but in the meantime the ranchers have been aroused and a full score of cowboys take the trail in pursuit of the rustlers. A thrilling chase follows in which, one after another, the thieves are run down and shot from their mounts. Hawkins, himself, manages to outdistance his pursuers and, thinking that the safest course, doubles back toward the ranch.

Cameo carries off the squaw whom Hawkins had been abusing.

He enters the living room, which he finds deserted, and then crouches behind the table to await any pursuer who may have discovered his trail. Love's instinct has caused Cameo uneasiness for Hope, alone at the ranchhouse and, after taking part in the rounding up of the thieves, he sets out ahead of the others to visit Hope. Entering the room where Hawkins lies in wait for him, he is of course at a disadvantage, and the bad man covers him with his gun and then begins to taunt him for being helpless.

Unknown to Cameo, however, help is at hand, for Paecha, the little squaw, whom he had befriended, has been passing and seen his predicament. Not only has Cameo been kind to her, but Hawkins has basely deserted her, after teaching her to love him, so the girl has a two-fold motive as she brings her own revolver from its holster and sends a bullet crashing through Hawkins' breast. Her vengeance accomplished, Paecha enters the ranchhouse and confesses her crime to Cameo and Hope, who has now entered the room. Neither is willing to see her prosecuted for the deed she has committed and so they permit her to depart in peace.

His enemy lifeless at his feet, the rustlers wiped out in that part of the country, and the cattle all restored to Colonel Houston, Cameo feels that leisure for love making has arrived and accordingly holds out his arms toward Hope who willingly goes to his eager embrace as the picture fades from the screen.

The cast is as follows:

Cameo, a cowpuncher .....William Garwood
Hope, Col. Houston's daughter.....Vivian Rich
Hawkins, cowpuncher and rustler.....Jack Richardson
Col. Houston, ranch owner.....Harry Von Meter
Carson, neighboring rancher.....Harry De Vere
Pasquale, rustler .....Geo. Morrison
Bud, rustler .....Manuel Sampson
Paecha, a squaw.....Josa Melville
Old squaw .....Louise Lester

Decision in Powers-Laemmle Case

By a decision of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, given on June 12 in the case of P. A. Powers against the Universal Film Company and Carl Laemmle, the decision of the minor courts against the former was set aside and Mr. Powers given the right to again bring action for the restoration of stock which he claims belongs to him. The court also ruled, however, that the future action must be against the Universal Company alone and that Mr. Laemmle must not be included.

The justices were George L. Ingram, Chester B. McLaughlin, Frank C. Laughlin, John Proctor and Francis M. Scott. Attorney Edward M. Match represented Mr. Powers, while the Universal and Mr. Laemmle were defended by W. G. Morse and J. B. Stanchfield, respectively.

The issue involved is the ownership of certain stock in the Universal Company which was originally the property of David Horsley. Mr. Powers claims he held an option on this stock and that he took advantage of this option before the time had expired. Mr. Laemmle claims that he purchased the same stock from Mr. Horsley. When Mr. Powers asked for a transfer of the stock on the Universal's books it was refused and the suit resulted.

There is no money involved in the action, and in case Mr. Powers is awarded the stock, Mr. Laemmle's purchase money will be returned. No announcement has been made of what action is to be taken in the future, but it is probable that Mr. Powers will continue his suit against the company, as the court gave him power to do.

On the Outside Looking In

By the Goat Man

THIS then, is the first edition of MOTOGRAPHY as a weekly. We have it all arranged with O'Malley, superintendent of second-class mails, Chicago post-office, who says it will go through in the regular way and we won't have to put any more stamps on the wrappers for city subscribers. They all go at a cent a pound now. Will Big Bill Sweeney, Chris Whelan, Sam Levine, Max Hyman and that other Chicago subscriber — besides Sid Smith — please take notice! It is great to be a weekly. For years and years we have hoped for enough clamor to warrant doing it every week. Now we will go along like this until the business demands a daily! That may be taken either way, but at the present rate, if maintained for another five and a half year period, the daily may not be such a bad proposition after all. For the business do move. The things we are doing to-day are quite different from the things we did a few years ago. Now nearly all of the old stars—both sexes—office managers of the "old guard," producers, camera men and dopesters have companies of their own. Money has been lugged in from the highways and byways and film-making has become a mania with the masses. The schemes of yesterday are as nothing, compared with the dreams of tomorrow.

Anna Little, featured in 101 Bison's "Prowlers of the Wild."

But the old guard has been first to discover that the short lengths must be preserved if the business as a whole shall continue to prosper. This is joyful news. I have seen some bully split-reel comedies that are itching to get into the programs. They must lie back for a month or two to give way to stuff that isn't nearly so good—two and three reelers that have been turned out because of footage value, other essentials being subordinated. The same is true of dramas. The story must all be told in a thousand feet with a punch in every inch and more and more of that kind of story. It's the only kind of film for the great mob. The really big films have found their place, but it is hard to handle the big ones in the country towns. It is pretty hard to realize that good old short lengths are brand new to audiences within a hundred miles of Chicago. It is just as hard for the average person to figure out how the third episode of the Adventures of Kathlyn is holding its own less than fifty miles from town. Mercy, where do they all score?

The making of good short lengths will involve the spending of more and more money. The manufacturers know this thoroughly. They are the shrewdest kind of business men—a thing I have repeated many times. They do not put their money into the actor's hand merely to gratify the immediate, personal whims of the actor-folk. They do not make larger outlay of funds for properties to keep the carpenters and scenic artists busy! And the reward for this added expense can not be seen with the naked eye. Due to a fixed selling plan the program reel that costs five thousand dollars returns no more to the maker than the one that cost one thousand dollars. Some day the condition will be corrected. It is all fine and dandy for the regular program maker to send out a stupendous multiple-reel attraction from time to time. He knows where it will thrive and he can pick the places and impose arbitrary rental charges, dealing direct. He has learned that these big side ventures are expensive propositions if they fall down and highly remunerative when they make a killing. The supposition is that he will go right along taking that chance all by himself. It doesn't hurt the regular program house at all and when properly analyzed, there can be only one result—uplift stuff—pulling in a class who are not regular m. p. attendants.

I get around to the producing plants only occasionally. There is method in my practice for I want always to retain the enthusiasm I feel for film manufacture. The thrill I felt when I first saw a balloon ascension, Niagara Falls, the Rocky Mountains, or the Woolworth Building is still retained. If I rambled around the film manufacturing plants as a regular thing I would lose this cherished enthusiasm. When I go out to the Selig plant, for example, and find a veritable detention station for wild animals and strange foreign birds, I get down on my hands and knees and study the critters with a boy's delight. If I was a regular habitue of the premises, these strangers would become commonplace. The beautiful pair of Australian cranes, the little cat-bear of the Himalayain mountain country, the peacock pheasants of India, the royal bengal tigers would only be part of the landscape. As it is, they mean something more than that. They bring back the recollection that William Nicholas Selig has one great obsession—that of owning the world's most wonderful zoological garden. If he hasn't attained it yet, fortune and health avoring him, there need be no doubt of the future. For Bill Selig has set his heart on it and beautiful Edendale will be his lasting monument.

I am going out there myself, next year, and when I do, I'll show you a picture story without flicker.

Those of you who are patient enough to follow this purely layman's piffle, wherein I set down my personal beliefs, likes and dislikes, may have discovered a vast silence respecting that faction of m. p. exhibitors who will convene at Dayton, July 6-11. This has not been because of disrespect to them. I am going to Dayton to exert a full man-power in attempting to form one great exhibitor's association—an amalgamation of the two organizations that now exist. I was at the birth of both bodies. I have followed their performances past and present. With a common interest in exhibitors' welfare, I can see no reason for two organizations. There is imperative need for one great body with a broad-gauged man at the head of it and an executive force smart enough to outline a working plan that will meet all the requirements of the association. The time to do this work is at Dayton. A failure to do it will be disastrous to the exhibitors of this country. Fortunately, there is nothing at Dayton to distract the delegates. It isn't in any sense a film center. It is a convenient and accessible point for a large body of exhibitors and I'm sure there will be hundreds of them present to listen to the reasons why all should forget past differences and enlist under one banner. Dayton will go down into history as the place where film men found common ground. It will be the scene of the last national convention of exhibitors. The National Cash Register Company will never again have the honor to be host to a national organization of film men. There are only three places in this country for these gatherings and they are plainly, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles. Los Angeles should have next year's convention. I know one film manufacturer who will guarantee all the expenses of a suitable hall and we all know that all the manufacturers of films in this country will be glad to have the exhibitors as their guests in Los Angeles. When we return from the Dayton meeting I shall hope for two things as having been finally adjusted—one great exhibitor body and Los Angeles, the convention city in 1915.

The Dayton meeting should declare to the world that motion picture exhibitors are intelligent, far-seeing men with faith in their fellows. Their interests are purely mutual. The censorship problem, the length of show, the kind of show, has a common meaning. It is one cause—the promoting of unselfish interest, and politics should not be countenanced. The delegate who will go to Dayton with his hands tied by the foolish practice of "instructions" acknowledges his own weakness, and openly declares he has no mind of his own. The Dayton meeting is for thinking men and my faith in the country exhibitor leads me to believe he will come out of this convention with his colors flying.

And to think we'd start our weekly on the Fourth of July! The very next number—the one which will be in evidence at Dayton—will be dated July 11, but printed in Chicago, June 30. We need all this time for the newsdealer. MOTOGRAPHY has never made its boasts. We prefer being a "rutter." We hasten slowly, but surely. The service we are rendering is the kind that should interest all film makers and distributors and exhibitors. This service will be amplified and improved, but it isn't being apologized for. The things we set out to do are well done, if done at all. The shouting will be left for the other fellows.

See you at Dayton, my brother.

Famous Humorist Discusses Sausage

Irvin S. Cobb says there are 336 kinds of sausage, of which only three are edible. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle admits Mr. Cobb's count is correct but holds the opinion that only two can be eaten. Edward Brennan, soldier of fortune, author and actor, goes even further than Conan Doyle in disputing the American author's claim and holds that only one kind of sausage is eatable. Inasmuch as all three men are globe trotters of renown and have eaten sausage all over the world it may fairly be presumed that they are sausage experts.

The controversy started in this way: Cobb sat in the garden of Our Mutual Girl's house recently, recounting to Miss Phillips and Mayme Kelso his adventures abroad. Mr. Cobb told how he had annotated, connotated, analyzed and even eaten every known form of sausage. Soon after, Miss Phillips related Cobb's sausage statements to Edward Brennan, leading man in Our Mutual Girl serial. Mr. Brennan admitted that Cobb had made a correct tabulation of the different varieties, (an actor conceding, for once, that an author could be right in something), but held that only one kind of sausage is edible,—the kind that the diner prefers at the time he has his meal.

When Sir Arthur and Lady Doyle arrived in New York a few days ago on the Olympic they were met by Mr. Brennan. Brennan told Sir Arthur of Mr. Cobb's plunge into motion-picture work and incidentally repeated the Paducah humorist's rash statement in regard to sausage.

"If you have the opportunity," said Sir Arthur, with a twinkle in his eyes, "I wish you would tell him that in my travels through Germany I found all the kinds of sausage he did. But, whereas he found three varieties which were eatable, I found only two. Tell him that I have made exhaustive experiments of the genus bologna, frankfurter and Wienerwurst and found that only two of the species can be digested."

Brennan promised to convey the English author's message to Cobb and at the first opportunity wrote Cobb of Sir Arthur's criticism. Cobb was romping with his little twin dachshunds on the lawn of his summer home at North Hatley, Quebec, when he received the letter. Painstaking as he is in securing historical and other data for his books, Mr. Cobb at first was displeased at Sir Arthur's criticism.

Gathering "Wieny" and "Wurst," his dachsunds, to his lap (Cobb's lap really is ample) he sat down and, in the heat of passion, dictated the following reply to Sir Arthur:

De gustibus non disputandum. Personally I prefer knackwurst to cervellatwurst, and krautwurst to bratwurst. On occasion I am fond of tafelwurst and bauernwurst. If real hungry I will eat pinkelwurst and luebecker saucischen just as readily as I will down a highly spiced ligature of bologna or a Coney Island hot dog. However, none of these can compare with blutwurst as it is served in Cologne, or with immaculate leberwurst and juicy wienerwurst as they roll out of the sausage fillers in Vienna.

The fifty-seven or more varieties of the genus saucischen of Saxony were quite unfit to eat, principally because the license tags and collor plates of the ingredients were not properly ground. The dogs in Schneeburg are called golf dogs because always they are bound for the links.

In some instances the hydraulic pressure used in compressing the ragout within the outer envelope was not sufficient to ensure a compact product and the rattling of what once were leather collars between the walls of the surrounding capsule gave forth a hollow sound which faintly resembled the bark of a canine wraith. Reasoning from these premises, I surmised—and rightly, I think you will now agree with me—that these species of the genus are not comestibles in the strict sense of the term.

I await your reply, feeling confident that my judgment will be vindicated.

Irving S. Cobb, Our Mutual Girl (Norma Phillips) and Mrs. Knickerbocker (Mayme Kelso.)

While at Our Mutual Girl's house on Long Island Mr. Cobb recently posed for the Mutual movies. Four hundred feet of film were used to encompass Mr. Cobb's bulk. Panoramic views of the Kentucky leviathan were taken from all angles, head on, and at right angles, while fifty feet of celluloid were used up in filming the subject's sausage-container.

Eclair Novelties in Demand

During the week of novelties, souvenirs and advertising surprises of all kinds at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, from June 8 to June 13, one of the most sensational and original hits of the Exposition was the Eclair "Western gun" distributed by that company at its booth. This deadly appearing and realistic looking revolver had all the ear marks of an honest to goodness mining camp weapon. On the handle was imprinted a group of the Eclair Western players and on the barrel on one side was the slogan, "Eclair Hits the Mark," while on the other side was imprinted photographs of the leading Eclair players in bull's eye frames, and the barrel carried the advice, "Aim for Bigger Receipts with Eclairs."

The crowds which visited the Palace clamored so strongly for these revolvers that they broke the railing about the Eclair booth several times, and it was a common sight on the floor to see young and old with those guns stuck in their pockets or held in their hands laughingly holding each other up.

Requests from numerous people and exhibitors out of town have been received at the Eclair offices for thousands of Eclair guns and it is planned by several of the leading exhibitors of the country to hold what will be termed "Western Eclair Night" on which occasion the Eclair revolver will be distributed as souvenirs to all the patrons who attend.

New Company For Warner's Program

Arrangements have been completed whereby the feature productions of the United States Film Corporation will become a regular part of the program of Warner's Features, Inc.

The United States Film Corporation is headed by Arthur Nelson and A. R. Pelton. It is located near San Diego, California, on a 220,000 acre ranch where a commodious studio has been erected. Prominent among the members of the company are Lawrence Peyton, Natalie de Lontan, Karl Formes and others equally well known. Mr. Nelson, president and general director, has been long associated with successful productions, having written, directed and starred in a number of "long-run" plays.

The organization will make a specialty of semi-western three-part films. The date of the first release will soon be announced by Warner's Features, Inc.

Another Max Comedy

The split reel comedy, "Max the Magician," was released by the Pathe Freres company on June 23. Max Linder plays the leading part and is the same funny Max that has supplied the laughs in other Pathe comedies.

A magician, entertains at a party at which Max is present and becomes popular because of his skill. Max aspires to the "art of the mysterious" and at home practices the tricks he has seen, but without success. He receives a letter from Whizzer who, for a very small sum, promises to teach him the magic art. The magician has taken his servant into the secret. When Max arrives he is shown a fluid which makes the portion of the body rubbed with it insensible to pain. To illustrate its use the magician (Whizzer's servant in disguise) rubs it on his face and allows Max to slap him. He shows no sign of pain. Max buys a bottle and introduces it at a party. One of the guests offers herself as a subject but on being slapped yells with pain. Max's social career is ended.

On the same reel are scenic views of the historic Saint Cloud, built in 1658.

THIS IS THE WEEKLY

VOLUME XII, Number 1—which is this particular issue of Motography—has at least one feature of great significance: It is the first of fifty-two which will appear during the next twelve months. For Motography is now a weekly.

When a trade paper is published every seven days it is quite apt to degenerate into a mere newspaper; for the days pass quickly, the work must be done always under a demand for speed, a high pressure that constantly tempts the editorial staff to neglect the small but important details that must have attention if the trade is to be proud of its journal. In almost any trade field a comparison of the weekly papers with those appearing less frequently will show that the latter are the more attractive and interesting.

If, as we are frequently told, Motography has always been pre-eminently attractive and interesting, it has probably been attributed by many to the fact that appearing only every other week gave more time for the niceties of publication. That particular idea we are going to prove wrong. The weekly Motography will be just as attractive as ever—more so, if it is possible to make it.

Motography weekly will, of course, be more of a newspaper than it has previously been—but only in the sense that it will print all the news up to the minute of going to press. It will still remain a magazine in the best sense of the word—one that motion picture men can be proud of, and that the interested lay reader will continue to keep upon his parlor table.

NEW FEATURES FROM OLD REELS

FILM history is full of single reel dramas and comedies that made, in their day, a tremendous hit. These, of course, died the death of all film stories, although they had been seen by but a small proportion of the possible total of theater patrons.

We have touched upon the subject of film revivals before. Needless to say, we unqualifiedly approve of the revival of good film subjects; and in deciding which are the good ones, nothing can be nearer final than the favor of those who have already seen them. The revival not only gives those who have not seen them a chance, but lets those who were particularly impressed see them over again. And that the "over-again" enthusiasts are quite numerous every student of drama knows. Almost everyone can recall plays which he has attended at least twice.

Ordinarily a film revival would merely mean making some new prints from the old negative. In exceptional cases some scenes might be retaken to bring the subject up to date or improve it. But of late it is becoming quite the vogue among producers to select a particularly successful single reel from the dim and dusty past of some two years or so, and reproduce it as a multiple reel feature.

To stretch a single reel subject, already successful and therefore already satisfactory, into two or more reels is quite a trick of producing. Of course the story must have the material in it to make the extra footage, and make it without padding. It must be as good a two or three reel subject as it was originally a single. That, of course, is up to the judgment of the producers. To their credit it may be said that the experiment has now been tried several times without a failure.

It has been difficult to get any more really good original scenarios for multiple reel features than were absolutely necessary. It is an enterprising stroke to utilize some of the excellent material that has gone to waste after a totally inadequate showing in an abbreviated form. The lists of past releases will doubtless yield much more good stock for this sort of magnified revival.

VAUDEVILLE ON THE WANE

WE used to feel called upon every little while to write bitter editorials condemning the practice of running low grade vaudeville acts to fill out picture theater programs. That is no longer necessary; the custom has already become obsolete. Pictures today are better, and attract more patronage, than even the best vaudeville.

At the convention banquet a few weeks ago Jesse L. Lasky, an old vaudeville man who has gone into pictures, said it could not be denied that vaudeville was on the decline, while the motion picture business promised a brilliant and prosperous future. He announced his intention of devoting every minute of his time to pictures and entirely neglecting vaudeville; and in this project he was receiving splendid support from the exhibitors.

Every motion picture exhibitor is a film fan naturally. But none of them is in business for his health alone, or just because he loves the pictures. As a showman of proper spirit he is ready to show what the people want, be it vaudeville or pictures. He has found the answer to be pictures; the people have lost interest in vaudeville.

There is no need to analyze this situation. Every picture man who is familiar with vaudeville—and most of them are, more or less—knows that it is merely a matter of which is the better show. Long ago, when there were no such pretentious picture productions as are common today, the public would have been willing to get along without vaudeville—and did, except where some exhibitors forced it on them. The secret of the matter is that vaudeville does not and cannot, by its very nature, improve. As an art, if art it can be called, it gains little or nothing from ingenuity and invention. It is essentially the same today as it was when it first gained popularity in the middle of the eighteenth century.

Vaudeville is the narrowest possible form of entertainment. Motion pictures is the broadest possible form.

COMBINE YOUR FORCES

NOW that the exhibitors who attended the convention in New York are again buried in the busy routine of their day's work, the effort to consolidate all the forces of the business into one comprehensive organization should not be allowed to lag.

There is no reason or excuse for more than one association of exhibitors. Those who attended the convention realize that fact; but those who did not attend should realize it also—and not only realize it, but appreciate its importance. To build and maintain any associaton demands hard work and earnestness. To build and maintain two associations in the same field means double work, double expense, double difficulty—and far less than half the benefits.

One of the unfortunate features of two associations is that the members of each are prejudiced against the other. They regard each other as rivals, and spend too much time in acts and discussions of rivalry. Very few are members of both, and most of them consider their own the only real organization, while the rival body is the interloper. These circumstances make it very difficult to absorb either association into the other one.

The only answer to the problem is to organize an entirely new association with an entirely new name and new officers. To this the members of neither old association can object. Most of them will welcome the solution of the difficulty, for they will all concede the absurdity of two organizations.

In every association are a certain number of enthusiasts, men who are willing and glad to work, and who have a real talent for organization and committee functions. These are the men who make successful associations possible, and their talent must not be wasted. There is no reason why committee-men or even officers of the rival associations could not or would not serve on the same committee of a new association.

But these men need no spur. They are already on the job and doing their best. It is the rank and file of exhibitors, busy with their own affairs, who must be convinced that an association is absolutely necessary, that there must be but one association, and that they are the material out of which such an organization must be made. If every exhibitor who reads this (or who has it before him to read if he will) would but give an occasional half hour to discussion of organization with his fellows—his competitors, if you like the term—the benefits of association would at once become so apparent that the new society would be organized in a hurry.

THAT EDISON PATENT AGAIN.

A FEW years ago the word "independent" in motion pictures was a symbol of warfare and litigation. The Motion Picture Patents Company and the independent companies attacked each other hammer and tongs, day and night. But it is quite a little while now since we have heard even a whisper of Patents Company-independent enmity. Each has developed its own half of the field peacefully and quietly, and here and there the two have even lain down in the same bed.

Now we get an echo of the old fight. Judge Mayer of the United States Circuit Court has held that the Warwick camera used by the Laemmle interests is an infringement on the Edison patents controlled by the Motion Picture Patents Company, and has authorized the company to enter a decree perpetually enjoining the independents from using the camera in question.

We shall see now whether the suspension of hostilities between licensed and independent forces is due to an actual amnesty or merely to commercial desuetude. Will the independents continue to use the Warwick camera and carry on the fight, or will they continue it without being required to fight, or will they stop using it?

The Men's Club of the Granville Presbyterian Church, Chicago, visited the laboratories of the American Film Manufacturing Company recently and made a tour of every department evincing considerable interest as the details of procedure were disclosed. The club was loud in its praise of the American "Flying A" and "Beauty" productions, particularly the exquisite photography and gorgeous beauty of nature portrayed.

EDWARD BOULDEN was born in Roanoke, Virginia. His mother was French, his father Irish, and Mr. Boulden seems to have inherited the happy attributes of both nationalities. He is slender, very slender, and has blue-gray eyes, fine teeth and a pleasing personality. His service with the Edison company covers a term of five years and in that time, he claims to have played every role possible, with the exception of that of a policeman. He can give no reason for so popular a characterization being off his list, but owns up to the number of messenger-boy roles that have been thrust upon him. And he makes a perfectly lovable old man. Comedy character parts are his specialty and he possesses a head of thick, blonde hair that lends itself to any variety of comedy make-up. He is seen to advantage in the Andy series of pictures.

Edward Boulden.

CORA WILLIAMS has been in the Edison company for two years playing character parts and she is known as "The girl with the dimples." They are wonderful dimples as film-goers know; but film-goers do not know perhaps, that a voice even more wonderful goes with them. It was her voice and her dimples which inspired the composition of the light opera, "The Laughing Girl," which was known better in Europe than in this country. Here, it developed into the popular "Three Twins" comic opera in which Miss Williams did not appear. She sang in many operatic productions, her years on the legitimate stage having been twenty. Four of these were in dramatic stock and two in operatic stock. After spending several years abroad, she applied to the Edison studio and her first trial resulted in her staying.

Cora Williams.

MAE ABBEY is well known to all who follow any or many of the Edison regular releases and her comedy work has been rewarded with the laughs of the film public. Unique character roles are hers and she handles them in a manner that marks her as a born comedienne. "But I don't like to linger around in the same role for long," Miss Abbey explained what she called her peculiarity. "I'm all enthusiasm going into a role but if it isn't finished in a couple of days, I get awfully tired of it. Motion picture work should teach me patience; and I'm hoping it will." Miss Abbey came to the Edison studio about two years ago and she brought experience from nine years spent on the legitimate stage and three years in stock. Since then, her experience has covered almost every variety of character work and the newest one is always the one that receives her best attention.

Mae Abbey.

CHARLES OGLE is six feet, two and one-half inches and is the tall man of the Edison studio. The screen does not show him to be that tall and Mr. Ogle himself admits that a personal meeting with anybody who has seen him on the screen, is always a surprise to the other person. Character work is Mr. Ogle's special line and he says his five years in Edison stock was preceded by two months at the Biograph studio. He was educated for the ministry, took up law and practiced three years in Hammond, Indiana, and then went on the stage and remained there twenty-seven years, mostly in the service of the Shuberts. and Klaw and Erlanger. He played in Clyde Fitch's "Blue Mouse" company and that was his farewell appearance. After that Biograph and then the Edison company. Mr. Ogle has black eyes, black hair that is somewhat grayed, and a throaty voice.

Charles Ogle.

Walsh an Adventurer

Raoul A. Walsh, who plays heavy leads for the Reliance and Majestic companies, was born in New York City, but he can come pretty near to calling the world his home. When fifteen years old he ran away from home and before he saw New York again he had circled the globe and had visited every continent. He went on a cattleship to South Africa and after a few months there worked his way to South America. His stay in Peru was short but exciting. An Englishman had started a revolution and young Walsh joined him. The revolution was brief and the Englishman was shot. Walsh would have suffered a similar fate had he been caught.

Some months later the adventurous young man was in Mexico where he was a cowboy for a time and then became a bullfighter. He was a professional toreador at Chihuahua for a year but after being seriously injured and spending a long time in a hospital, he moved to Texas. There he played baseball, being a pitcher for one season with the Galveston team of the Texas League.

When the baseball season ended Walsh joined Robert Mantell's company in which he played small parts for three seasons. He finally landed in New York where he played in "Charlie's Aunt," "Salomy Jane," "A Romance of the Underworld" and "Thais." He also appeared in musical comedy where his tenor voice was of value to him.

Two years ago Walsh joined the Biograph company of which D. W. Griffith was director and when Mr. Griffith joined the Reliance and Majestic companies as director in chief, he took Walsh with him. One of the first tasks assigned to Walsh was the role of Villa in "The Life of Villa."

Walsh is an athlete who keeps in training. He plays second base on the Reliance-Majestic team of the California Motion Picture League in which he has a batting average close to .500.

Booklet on Ventilation

The Typhoon Fan Company, 1544 Broadway, New York, has issued a booklet describing its various heating, cooling, ventilating and drying systems which are at present being used extensively in public buildings and theaters throughout the United States and Canada.

The little book explains all the important points of the various fans manufactured by this concern.

Just A Moment Please

Well, fellers, we're off on the long grind.

The mere thought of grinding out a whole column of this nonsense once a week instead of every fourteen days has us scared, but we're hoping our friends will all come to the rescue and help out whenever they can.

Cleary of Edisonville is proving himself a good fellow by helping us fill nearly a quarter of a column with the champion "still picture" of the world. It is so pre-eminently, so indisputably and so self evidently the stillest sort of a "still" that we have decided to confer upon him the Master of Arts degree of the Caward Art College. Behold his offering just below:

Hold the page about twelve inches from the eyes and on a line parallel with the tip of the nose, then revolve rapidly from left to right (or from right to left if you prefer) and you will have a lifelike motion picture of the Edison booth at the recent Exposition just 2 minutes, 12 9/10 seconds before it was occupied by the Edison stars.

Speaking of Edison reminds us that there is a certain party in Orange, N. J., who has had the cruelty to write us:

Never again will I furnish you information regarding the restoration or cultivation of hair on ivory when you continue to ignore my very existence and give the credit to that Robinson man. Although your caricature in a recent issue of Motography resembles a species of cactus, it is very encouraging to know that the tonic was strong enough to bring out something.

We're patient and long suffering, but, by heck, there is a LIMIT to what we can stand for.

THE EDITOR'S BRAINSTORM.

Anna, the little red head, who presides over the telephone switchboard and helps us out by reading copy on the "Brevities of the Business," yesterday came across a vivid description of a fire which destroyed the village Opry House "shortly after midnight this morning." She wondered when that was, but we patiently explained that it was directly after sunrise this evening, and now she understands perfectly.

Speaking of Anna reminds us that we've a new assistant who hasn't been properly introduced yet. His name is Caine and he hails from Milwaukee. He's as tall, lean and lanky as we ourselves and is already getting acquainted with folks in Our Burg. Gentlemen, Mr. Caine. Treat him white and we know he'll do everything possible for you.

My, what a long ways it is to the bottom of this column, especially on a hot day.

This ought to about make it.

Yep, it does.

Selig Releasing Hot Weather Film

"The Wilderness Mail"

EXHIBITORS looking for a hot weather attraction—a film which will "pack 'em in" when the mercury in the thermometer is trying to climb out of the top of the tube, will hunt a long time before finding a better drawing card for such weather than "The Wilderness Mail," the Selig two-reel feature scheduled for release on July 13.

From the first scene to the last snow greets the eye. It lies in drifts in the forests, it blows and whistles through the cracks of cabins and rough log shacks, and when doors are opened it whirls in a perfect avalanche! Snow covers the players from head to foot, and at times they sink up to their hips in mounds of the flaky stuff, while making their way from one point to another. Won't such a picture as that send a shiver down the backs of your patrons on even the hottest day of summer and enable you to appropriately advertise "Twenty degrees cooler inside"?

Joan drives in the real murderer at the point of a rifle.

However, it must not be supposed that the merit of the production lies entirely in its cool atmosphere, for such is far from being the case—the action in several of the scenes is decidedly hot stuff, and the struggle between Jan and Otto during one portion of the film reminds one vividly of that grim struggle in "The Spoilers" which bids fair to become a standard for all "fights" of the future. Photographically the picture is a gem, and one has only to state that it is played by many of the stars who enacted the principal roles in "The Spoilers" to impress the exhibitor with the fact that it is a noteworthy production. Wheeler Oakman, Joe King, Bessie Eyton, Lillian Hayward and Tom Mix are all well cast and given many opportunities to display their art.

As the story opens we discover that Jan, the hunter, is a gentle young giant and a wholly likable fellow, while Otto, the driver of the wilderness mail, has been spoiled by adulation and is mean, vengeful and wholly selfish. Both men have been attracted by Marie, a fascinating siren of the woodlands of the north, who is accepting the adulation of both men, though really more in love with Otto, who has charmed her by his daring and impudence. Marie has a half-sister, Joan, who is of the sweet and lovable type, but over whom Marie has exerted her sway for so long that the girl feels helpless and awkward when her sister is about.

When Jan, the hunter, arrives with a beautiful pelt, Marie throws her arms about him and finally wheedles him into making her a present of the beautiful skin. After Jan has departed, Otto comes upon the scene and Marie again becomes the coquette, and ere Otto leaves he hands Marie a bundle of goods he has brought her from the distant settlement. Joan, also in love with Jan, is deeply incensed over the conduct of Marie in coquetting with both men, and while Otto is busy with her sister Joan steals away in the forest by herself.

Later Otto, en route with his mail, comes upon her in the deep snows of the forest and seeks to kiss her. Joan, insulted, screams, and Jan, who happens to have witnessed the struggle from a distant hill, comes to her rescue. The sturdy Jan leaps upon Otto and hurls him away from the girl as a terrier would shake a rat. After a long struggle Otto is completely worsted and goes away swearing revenge.

Shortly afterward Jan is given a commission to deliver a certain letter to a distant fort. He is promised a rich reward if he can deliver the letter before the regular mail reaches the fort, and after calling at the cabin where dwell Marie and Joan, and telling the girls of his mission, he sets out to win the reward. So speedy is his dog team that ere long he passes Otto on the trail and then decides to take a short cut across a frozen lake in the hope of still further gaining on Otto and the regular mail. Unfortunately, however, the ice which covers the lake proves too thin to support Jan and his dog team, and the young hunter is soon floundering about in the ice cold water and calling loudly for help. Otto beholds his predicament and sneeringly deserts Jan, believing that his enemy will surely perish. Happily Jan's dogs are highly intelligent and eventually he is drawn to the surface of the ice by means of the dog harness.

An outlaw who is lying in wait for the mail sees Jan and from a distance shoots at him, but by some lucky chance the hunter escapes the bullet. Realizing his mistake, the outlaw hides again and waits until Otto passes, when he again raises his rifle to hs shoulder and shoots the mail carrier. In order to throw pursuers off his trail the outlaw then climbs a nearby tree by means of a rope which he throws over the branches, and then, crawling out upon a long bough, drops into Jan's trail and hurries off in that direction.

A detail of Northwest mounted police come upon Otto's dead body and soon hit upon Jan's trail as a clue to the route taken by the murderer. Jan delivers his message successfully, but on the return trip is seized by the police and hustled off to the nearest jail.

News of Jan's plight reaches Marie and Joan, and the latter decides to go to Jan without delay, but the other girl contents herself by writing him a note berating him as a coward and declaring that he has killed the only man she loves. Jan, deeply injured by the tone of Marie's note, is immensely cheered when he receives a call from Joan, and after describing to the girl his meeting with Otto and the latter's desertion of him when he sank into the lake, he is surprised to have Joan declare that she will secure the evidence whch will free him.

Hastening to the scene of the crime, Joan soon determines that the murderer must have utilized the branches of the nearby tree in making his escape, and after discovering the dangling rope by which he had ascended to the lowest branches she is sure she is on the right track. Eventually striking the trail of the real murderer, Joan follows and surprises the man in his cabin. Finding the man half drunk, she seizes his rifle and some of the mail he had stolen, as proof that he is the real thief and the murderer, and drives him ahead of her to the headquarters of the mounted police.

Joan's plucky deed in capturing the murderer is loudly praised by the police and Jan is instantly released. The girl's deed has also opened the eyes of the young trapper as to her worth and he realizes that she means far more to him than Marie, her sister, ever had. It is not hard to guess, therefore, that the little church in the clearing will in the near future be the scene of a pretty wedding.

The cast is as follows:

Jan, the trapper.....Wheeler Oakman
Otto, driver of the wilderness mail.....Joe King
Joan .....Bessie Eyton
Marie .....Lillian Hayward
Outlaw .....Tom Mix

Progressive Makes First Release

Screens "Master Cracksman"

"THE MASTER CRACKSMAN" was initially shown at the Cort Theater on Wednesday morning, June 17. This is the first production of the Progressive Motion Picture Corporation and might be said to partake of the firm's corporate name, for it progresses far beyond any other film of the same class which has yet been released. It is in six parts.

A popular drama on the speaking stage, the production of the screen version insures its popularity in pantomime. The scenes from first to last are full of action directed towards a purpose. There are many veins in the story, all apparently running parallel, but toward the end they gradually merge into one, forming a sensational but possible and probable climax.

Originality and well-directed effort in detail, the general completeness of the scenes themselves, and the elimination of the haziness in connection that scenes are wont to have, mark Harry D. Carey as a most able director, aside from any praise due him in his portrayal of the titular role, clever "Gentleman Joe."

In one of the tensest scenes in the picture the pathos is interpreted by a rat, just a plain common ordinary rat, but more effectively than any show of emotion could have done it. The scene is in the death house of a prison. The prisoner, in his solitary confinement, has made friends with a rat and has gotten him into the habit of coming every day for a few crumbs. The day of the execution the rat comes out as usual. The cell is empty. He runs along the bench to where he is in the habit of being petted and fed, but his friend does not appear.

The photography is good throughout, and in several places, such as the camp-fire scenes, exceptional. Cut-backs are used to good advantage.

"The Master Cracksman" is characterized by Harry Carey. "Gentleman Joe," as he is known by the police, is a brainy criminal who plies his trade under the guise of evening clothes. Profession rather than trade would be the name for his system of operating. Mr. Carey makes a typical "gentleman crook."

Cool-headed and quick-witted in a crisis, and like a flash when the time comes for action.

Rexford Burnett, as Harold Martin, had probably the most emotional role in the cast, that of the wayward son unjustly convicted of murder. Louis Morrell is good as the scheming, selfish cousin, Robert Kendall. E. A. Locke is seen as the stern father, Peter J. Martin, a retired diamond merchant. Herbert Russell, as Capt. Dan McRae, is a detective of the aggressive, suspicious type. The role of Violet Dane, Kendall's sweetheart, is well played by Marjorie Bonner. The characters of Ruth Martin and June Day are taken by Fern Foster and Juliette Day respectively. William H. Power plans the role of Nicholas Moses, notorious fence and money lender. The characterization of Redman Day (Roland DeCastro), District Attorney (Hayward Mack) and Officer Jim Buckley (Gregory Allen) complete an able cast of well selected types whose personality and enthusiasm is well demonstrated.

Peter J. Martin, retired diamond merchant, is the owner of a notorious 9-carat diamond which he plans to give his daughter Ruth on her twenty-first birthday at a party in her honor. In order to forestall any attempts at robbery Mr. Martin arranges by 'phone with Dan McRae, a detective, to guard the jewel. "Gentleman Joe" reads of the party and determines to impersonate McRae. The night of the affair he enters McRae's apartments, overcomes him, takes his invitation and calling cards, and is admitted to the party and taken into Mr. Martin's confidence.

Harold Martin, an only and wayward son, has been cut off from further allowance by his father. Robert Kendall, Harold's cousin, who lives with the Martins has become indebted to a Nicholas Moses, who insists that if his debt is not paid within a given time he will bring suit for the money. To avoid this, Kendall decides to steal the "Martin Diamond," which will pay his debts and furnish him with some money besides. The day of the party Kendall meets Harold who is intoxicated. He prevails upon him to take a friend of his, Violet Dane, a woman of questionable character to the party, knowing that by so doing he will get into further trouble with his father.

At the party Harold's appearance with Miss Dane precipitates a quarrel with his father and Harold is ordered from the house.

Before he has a chance to procure the diamond, "Gentleman Joe" discovers Kendall in the act of taking it. McRae's appearance at the party, dishevelled and excited, makes things warm for Joe and by a clever ruse he manages to escape. Later, after the guests leave, he comes back to take the jewel from Kendall's hiding place, and, peering through the window, sees Kendall standing in the room with the diamond in his hand. Mr. Martin enters, discovers the jewel, accuses his nephew of the crime, and is struck on the head with a cane. Entering to seek forgiveness, Harold finds his father dead and his cane lying broken on the floor. The police find him there and arrest him on suspicion. At the station, during a third degree, Harold admits the crime as a means of escaping further persecution.

In reading the account of the murder, Joe learns that he is suspected of the theft of the diamond. To escape arrest he leaves for the hills. While there he reads of Harold's conviction for his father's murder. For Ruth's sake Joe returns, enlists the aid of Violet Dane, who is jealous because of Kendall's attention to Ruth, and they force the murderer and thief to write a confession of his crimes. Joe hands Kendall a gun and gives him the choice of suicide or arrest. The police find Kendall dead and beside him the signed confession. Harold is released and finds that the love of his fiance, June Day, has not in any way lessened because of his recent rashness.

"Gentleman Joe" is visited at his apartments by Dan McRae, who has nothing "on him," and together they talk over the details of the late murder and robbery. Joe passes his jar of tobacco to McRae; the latter inserts his fingers and brings forth the "Martin diamond."

All Star Films Vivid Sinclair Story

George Nash Featured

THE All Star Feature Corporation is presenting Upton Sinclair's story of "The Jungle" in five interesting reels that are photographically perfect, take away the public's appetite for ham and sausage forever-more and that show us-of-this-half how they-of-the-other-half work, and starve, and sacrifice, and exist. And all this is told as it should be. It is as Upton Sinclair hoped to reach the people with his doctrine of a co-operative commonwealth, though it is not as Upton Sinclair told the story in its entirety in his book, "The Jungle." That would have made the film undesirable. As it is, the film may be offered as entertainment or instruction. For it is both.

And in it George Nash, late of "The Yellow Ticket" and "Panthea," gains new laurels in his interpretation of the Lithuanian, Jurgis Rudkus. He makes a splendid Jurgis, and Gail Kane of "Seven Keys to Baldpate" is all that the character calls for in the role of Ona, sweetheart of Jurgis and, later, his wife. Mrs. Julia Hurley, already known to film goers as a screen artist, is praise-worthy as the old mother, Elzbieta. The other characters which carry along the pitiful story of the hardness of life in the foreign settlement "back of the yards" and the one of packing-house disregard of impurity in its products, all are true to their respective roles. An especial word of praise is due the settings, as the atmosphere of the whole five reels depends almost entirely upon their adherence to things as they are, in packing-town. The "yards" with their cattle-runs, their elevated runways and the interior views of portions of the packing-house, conform to the originals. While the picture was taken in Jersey, the locale might easily be taken for that of the big "yards" of Chicago, in which setting the story was written.

In about fifty feet of the picture, the author of "The Jungle," Mr. Sinclair is seen in the socialist hall to which Jurgis and others of the toilers turn for enlightenment as to the way out of the long-hours and short-pay and strike problems.

The story in brief runs as follows:

In a peasant village of far away Lithuania lives old Antanas with his wife, his step-daughter Ona, and two younger children, Kotrina and Stanislovas. Jurgis Rudkus, of a neighboring village, is betrothed to the beautiful Ona.

Jokubas Szedvillas, an old friend of Antanas, who some years earlier has come to America in search of fortune, writes in glowing terms to Antanas, telling of the great opportunities which the country offers and bidding him to come to it. Antanas becoming enthused, decides to migrate with his family. Jurgis is persuaded to go with them, as is Marija Berczyuska, a cousin of Ona's.

George Nash as "Jurgis" and Gail Kane as "Ona" in "The Jungle."

Arriving in America, the party goes to Chicago to meet Jokubas, and finds him established as the proprietor of an humble delicatessen shop. Among Jokubas' patrons is Connor, the foreman of the Durham packing house, and exercising his small influence, Jokubas secures employment through Connor for Jurgis, Ona, little Stanislovas and old Antanas.

Marija secures employment as a maid in the household of John Durham, the king of packingtown, and with each hand bringing its earnings to the humble household, soon happiness surrounds the hopeful people.

With this successful progression, there comes the eventful marriage of Ona and Jurgis, bringing its happiness to all save Marija, who, harboring a secret love for Jurgis, weeps in solitude as she watches her Jurgis being taken away from her by another.

Jokubas, with an eye for the commission which he sees for himself, unwisely advocates the purchase of a little cottage, and Jurgis, filled with enthusiasm and desire for Ona's happiness, gathers the family savings together and makes the initial payment, leaving no provision for the inevitable hardships which are to come.

Then suddenly into this new found golden world of happiness and content creeps a darkening cloud of despondency and despair for the unsuspecting Jurgis and his folk.

Durham, the packing house magnate, angered by the extravagance of his wife and son Freddy, orders a wage reduction of 20 per cent in his plant. Jurgis, leading his coworkers, pleads for a compromise at 10 per cent, and the flat refusal of Durham brings on a strike. Poverty comes upon the strikers, and old Antanas, weakened by the confinement of his horrible work and the absence of proper nourishment, is taken in the grip of death. Unable to meet the mortgage payment, the family is evicted from the little home. A strange sickness overtakes Kotrina, and she too, poisoned by the ill-smelling product of Durham's factory, dies in her mother's arms.

Freddy Durham, the wild young son of Durham, violates the trust of Marija, and as she demands money from him for her starving family, is overheard by Mrs. Durham, and peremptorily ordered from the house. Cowering with shame, she finds her way to the barren attic room which now houses her family and there meets Jurgis, who questions her and secures an admission of her guilt.

She is ordered from this home by Jurgis, and, homeless, she turns to the streets. She meets with a chance acquaintance who points an easier way to her, and with the sole desire of in some way aiding her starving kinsfolk, Marija's road to disgrace is begun.

Connor, the foreman, believing that at last Ona, whom he has long coveted, is within his power, calls at her home and attempts to force his attentions. In utter despair and with the sole thought of securing food for her starving baby, she reluctantly accepts his overtures. With the coming of the morning, Jurgis awakes from a drunken slumber to find Ona absent. Soon she returns with food which the money secured from Connor has enabled her to buy, but it is too late, for already the baby has died. In her emotion she denounces Connor, and Jurgis learns of her sacrifice. Blind with anger, he tears from the room in search of Connor to seek his vengeance. He finds him at the stockyards, and a terrific fight ensues in which Jurgis throws Connor from the runway down among the stampeding cattle. News of his deed is soon spread, and Jurgis, returning home just in time to bid good-bye to Ona as she lies dying, is arrested by the police. His plea for justice unheeded, he is convicted for his assault on the foreman and sentenced to prison.

Some time later Jurgis is freed and returns in search of his family, but can find no trace of them. Wandering aimlessly he drifts into a socialist meeting and for the first time since coming to America, hears a kindly word from a stranger and soon there is born in his breast an admiration for the teachings offered him. A brighter path opens its way and he becomes a teacher of the doctrines which have been taught him.

Once more on a brighter road, while preaching his doctrines to his fellow workmen, Jurgis' attention is drawn toward the curious action of a young girl who seeks to throw herself into the river. He rushes to her and prevents her act, discovering her to be the long lost Marija.

Upton Sinclair has addressed the Socialist meeting and made a convert of Jurgis.

Learning of the whereabouts of Elzbieta and Stanislova, Jurgis soon unites the family and leading Marija to the brighter land of his teachings, the "Co-operative Commonwealth," the love which Marija has always borne finds a way to Jurgis' heart.

The big Cines studios at Rome, were the scenes of lively preparations recently when three big companies of Cines players left for remote parts of the globe, according to a letter from the Baron Fassini to George Kleine.

Hughie Mack

"DANCING around—we were dancing around.—"

And others who had intended to, decided, with the sudden appearance of Hughie Mack on the floor, that they would wait for the next one and thus avoid the crush.

"—then he'd dip with his knees," syncopated the orchestra of four. But not Hughie. He grape-vined, he lame-ducked, he whirled, (judiciously), but he did not dip with his knees. He had regard for his three-hundred and forty-some pounds, also for the three or four other couples the floor managed to accommodate. For nobody but a Flora Finch would have survived had Hughie followed the dictates of the music and dipped with his knees.

"He'd trot her to a corner—" prompted the musical four.

The corners, also the side-lines of the Screen Club's impromptu ball-room were filled with valiant Screeners. They took up just as little space as possible, in tribute to Hughie and the limitations of the floor, and Hughie in return averted numberless panics by keeping nicely within the border-lines thus formed.

"Ah there, Hughie!" It was William Russell in salutation from the side-lines.

"All I get from here is a rear view of Hughie," came a voice back of Mr. Russell. "If he has a partner, she's successfully hidden."

Mr. Russell moved aside a mere two inches and allowed Billy Quirk a better view. "I see—he's not dancing alone then," Billy decided and returned to his glass of lemonade with the cherry in it.

"And the people would stay till the break of the day—

"While they were dancing around.—"

The music stopped. Hughie brought two knuckle-padded hands violently together several times and then allowed the valiant Screeners to continue the applause while he gently patted his forehead with an out-size linen handkerchief. But the musicians, as though the task of providing dance music for a fat man were a greater effort than that of observing tempo and rhythm for those who kept within the two-hundred pound limit, unhearingly deserted their wearied instruments and departed refreshment-wards.

"Water, water everywhere, but lemonade to drink," invited Hughie, seeing no water at all but plenty of other things. "Wait here and I'll bring some."

He made an opening through the crowds that a taxi could easily have followed, as far as space was concerned and, returning triumphant and lemonade-laden, took possession of the other chair the corner offered. I moved mine forward to be on a speaking level with Mr. Mack, for his occupancy of a chair also bespoke that of several feet of whatever space happened to be in front of it. At that, he looked as though he were sitting on the chair's very edge.

"Aren't you afraid lemonade will make you thin?" I asked, knowing he wasn't and that it wouldn't, anyway.

"Been training all my life, and the more I trained the fatter I got; I say 'trained' and 'got' because I stopped training."

"But you didn't stop getting fat."

"No, and I'm getting fatter. I always was fat, though. When I was sixteen, I weighed two-hundred and twenty pounds and went in for all the athletics going. And I went right along with them, a pound a day almost. I continued training, though, thinking that each new week or month would mark the beginning of my thinness. Instead of that—look at me!"

"Yes, but look at your Vitagraph comedies! You couldn't afford to get thin," I reminded him as the cherry in my glass eluded the two pursuing straws, for the third time. "The last time we talked about weight, you weighed three-hundred and eighteen."

"That was last summer, wasn't it?"

"Yes, in the Vitagraph studio yard. You were dressed as a messenger boy. It was a hot day."

"If I was dressed as a messenger boy, it must have been a hot day," decided Hughie. "The hotter and tighter the clothes I have to wear the hotter the day is sure to be."

"Well, the day was hot and your suit certainly looked tight," I remembered.

"John Bunny and Lillian Walker were taking you for a swim and there was nothing I wanted more on that hot day, than a swim," Hughie recalled. "But I had to stay and be a messenger boy."

"Yes, and you told me that you were twenty-eight years old and that before you came into pictures, you were an undertaker."

"I was, and the offer to work in pictures was purely accidental. It came from the Vitagraph company and was so much more profitable than undertaking that I gave the business to my brother and stayed here. That was almost two years ago. I came the day Bunny sailed for England. The only other theatrical experience I had was vaudeville; but I like pictures better," he concluded, resting his empty glass on the palm of one fat hand.

"I'm comfortable, even if I am fat, and I'm peaceable; I don't like arguments," he added.

"So I never have any," he further added.

Hughie's brown eyes closed to the tiniest of slits as he smiled his acknowledgment of a greeting from Marguerite Snow. It was the variety of smile that never fails to delight film goers and that added much to the enjoyment of the last personal-appearance sketch at the Vitagraph's Broadway theater, where

Mr. Mack was among those who scored highest in the way of laughs and popularity.

"I have to have everything I wear made to order —but I'm comfortable," he repeated. "And I'm glad that this is the last night of the exposition," he digressed. "Heat and crowds may melt some people, but not me, and I'm three-hundred and forty-something right now."

"Mercy!" I consoled, letting him have my empty glass as the musicians reseated themselves.

And Hughie Mack cleared a path for everybody as he returned the glasses to the brass railed counter and the man with the white apron.

Players Leave for Canada

The entire cast of the Life Photo Film Corporation, now engaged in the making of the six-part western psychological drama, "Northern Lights," left for Montreal, Canada, last week in a special car to complete the pictures that form a part of this production. As an instance of the extravagant scale upon which the Life Photo Film Corporation is putting on this production, a contract was made with the Army & Navy Stores Co. to ship to Canada, uniforms, accoutrements and complete outfit to supply an army of 700 soldiers and 400 Indians, which take part in the production in addition to the regular cast. The contract for this equipment called for the payments on a rental basis, in excess of three thousand dollars. The company, it is expected, will be gone for from two to three weeks. Mr. Edgar Lewis, the director, stated that this production is being staged with details never before attempted in motion pictures.

Immediately following the completion of "Northern Lights" the players will start work on "Capt. Swift," the drama which enjoyed such a long run on Broadway.

The company also purchased the world's motion picture rights to Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall, written by C. Haddon Chambers. The novelized form of the story is one of the most popular novels written within the past decade.

A cable was forwarded to Edward M. Roskam, president of the company, who is now in London, advising him of the fact, and requesting him to call at Haddon Hall, in the north of England where the story was originally laid, to the end that proper arrangements may be made to take the pictures at that spot.

The Photoplaywright of the Future

Emmett Campbell Hall, whose name, had the present practice of screen-credit to authors been in general use for the past three years, would be as familiar to every exhibitor and motion picture patron in the country as it is in the scenario departments and studios, and who at the present time, as a staff writer, is supplying many of the noteworthy Lubin dramas is most optimistic with regard to the future of the capable photoplaywright.

"The time will come," he says, "when the photoplaywright of real ability will have a personal following vastly exceeding, numerically, that of any author of books or short stories, for the reason that the photoplaywright's public is from three to five million for each release, while that of the most popular writer of printed fiction will not average 200,000 for a short story, and a slightly larger number for a very successful book.

"The exhibitors and the public will come to count on good plays from certain authors, and will ask for them, in advance, just as the works of popular fiction writers are ordered by book stores and individuals long before they go to press. The film manufacturers will of course avail themselves of this ready-to-wear popularity, and will advertise "A John Doe Drama every Wednesday"—if someone has been wise enough to tie John with a contract—or "A Special Richard Roe Feature." The fact that it is a release of the Nevermiss Company will be accented mildly, not shouted, for it will be appreciated that the important point is whether or not this particular release is good, and the Nevermiss Company will be too wise to perpetuate the mistake of proclaiming loudly that all Nevermiss releases are the acme of attainment—the Nevermiss trademark will mean to the trade just what the imprint of a good publishing house does—and we buy our books not, for instance, because they are published by Harper, but because they were written by Mark Twain. The manufacturer's name will guarantee photography and general standard of production—the names of the author and actors will hold out the promise of entertainment, for, as most persons are coming to admit, it is, when all is said and done, the story and the acting that count most. The greatest director who does, or ever will, live cannot make a good release from a poor story, though he may make a wonderful picture—a photodrama with the drama left out."

Of Interest to the Trade

Convention at Dayton

The annual convention and exposition of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will be held in Dayton, Ohio, during the week of July 6, and preparations are being made to accommodate a host of trade people.

Elaborate plans have been laid for the entertainment of the visitors and the schedule of business which will be transacted has been so arranged that it will in no way interfere with the social features. Governor Cox of Ohio will officially open the convention by pressing an electric button at the executive mansion in Columbus and Mayor Shroyer of Dayton will deliver the address of welcome.

The Memorial Hall has been chosen as the official meeting place and registration booths will be located there and at the Algonquin Hotel, all those who attend the convention being requested to register at one of these places and receive an order for a badge.

Every angle of the business will be touched upon at the exposition but for the benefit of the exhibitors it has been decided to bar the public during the morning hours each day, thus giving the showmen an opportunity to visit the many booths before the floor becomes crowded. At 1.30 P. M., however, the doors will be opened to all those who wish to attend the display.

To encourage the buying from manufacturers who have rented booths the committee in charge has offered several cash prizes for the exhibitors who buy the largest amount of goods from the booths.

Following is the program:

MONDAY, JULY 6.

10 A. M.—Governor James Cox of Ohio will start the exposition by pressing a button in the executive office at Columbus.

10.30 A. M.—Opening of the Second International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art. Address of welcome by Mayor Shroyer of Dayton to the manufacturers, jobbers and dealers of the motion picture industry.

Kleine Secures Cohan Comedies

George Kleine, who was responsible for the appearance of "Quo Vadis" and several other famous pictures in America, has just completed arrangements with Cohan & Harris, whereby he secures all rights to film two of the greatest comedy successes of that theatrical firm, "Officer 666" and "Stop Thief."

A deal has also been closed for the use of one of the big eastern studios of a licensed company and plans are being laid by Mr. Kleine to produce the plays in America, this being his first venture in the manufacturing game on this side of the water.

Life Photo Company Moves

About nine hours after the fire underwriters had ordered them to vacate the premises at 102 West One Hundred and First street, New York City, the Life Photo Film Company had secured a tract of land at Grantwood, N. J., and had drawn plans for an enlarged studio.

The order came at 8:30 on the evening of June 19 and was the result of a decision of the fire chief that the building was unfit for use for the purpose of handling films.

Luck favored the company as the play they are now engaged in making, "Northern Lights," required the removal of the entire cast to Canada the latter part of the same week, to get several exterior scenes.

The executive offices of the company, together with the office force of the Commercial Motion Pictures Company, Inc., which occupied the same building, moved to the Candler building about a month ago, so the closing of the plant will in no way affect the output of either of the companies.

Eclectic's Drama of India

Calcutta, India, is the scene of the plot in Eclectic's release of July 1 entitled, "The Pearl of the Punjab," a three part story in which jealousy, gratitude, and devotion all play prominent parts.

The Pathe players in Eclectic's "The Pearl of the Punjab."

Under the direction of Fred Wright, the picture was taken in St. Augustine which offers ideal scenery for Indian jungle and settlement pictures. To insert a little realism a jungle hunt on elephants is shown in which a tiger is seen bounding across the open foreground.

Popular Pathe players are seen in the cast which is as follows: Nellie Craig as Aissa, the Pearl of the Punjab; Lillian Wiggins as Sarah Hamilton; Walter Seymour as Captain Carruthers of the British medical service; George Busby as Colonel Herbert Allen, and Charles Brunnell as George Hamilton, who with his daughter, Sarah, has taken up residence in Calcutta.

Aissa conveys Carruthers to her jungle home.

While on a hunting trip in North India, George Hamilton and his daughter, Sarah, meet and adopt a little girl whose mother has just died. Aissa, as she is called, becomes Sarah's maid, and, because of Sarah's unmanageable temper, has an unhappy life. Captain Carruthers, a British surgeon, to whom Sarah is engaged, calls one day and witnesses her cruel treatment of Aissa. He reproves her for it. They quarrel and Sarah, in a rage, calls off the engagement and orders him from the house. His defence of her, stirs in Aissa a devotion to Carruthers that will last through life.

In the meantime the rich Colonel Allen has been paying attention to Sarah, and, because of his influence and wealth makes a favorable impression on her. Some time later Carruthers witnesses an affectionate scene between Sarah and the Colonel and in a jealous frenzy rushes in and strikes his superior officer, badly wounding him.

Aissa pleads with Carruthers to escape but he refuses. Securing the assistance of some of the other servants she drugs the surgeon and secretly has him taken to her native village. The tension of the last few weeks brings on a fever from which Carruthers recovers, but without any memory of the past. Aissa's devotion at last brings response from the surgeon and he stays at the Indian settlement where he becomes known as a wonderful healer.

After Carruthers' escape the colonel is nursed back to health and marries Sarah. On a hunting trip later he is stricken with appendicitis and taken to the village of the noted healer. His beard covering the scar, the colonel is not recognized by Carruthers who agrees to perform the operation. Sarah's appearance revives the surgeon's memory and, realizing the identity of his patient, he is at first tempted to allow him to die, but is brought to his senses by Aissa. The operation is successful. On recovering consciousness Allen recognizes his saviour and sits up, causing a bleeding in the wound which results in his death, but not however before he begs Carruthers' forgiveness. Unmoved by her husband's death, Sarah asks the surgeon to return to civilization with her but is spurned, his choice being Aissa whom he intends to make his wife.

Californinia Motion Picture Corporation

Reports from the Pacific coast to the effect that the California Motion Picture Corporation has created an unusual stir by the magnitude of its producing activities at San Rafael, have found wide currency throughout the motion picture trade.

This corporation, which is devoting its time exclusively to feature adaptations from famous books, plays and operas, has been carrying on actual operations at its Marin County studio, situated at the base of Mt. Tamalpais, since the first of May, the intention being to get several productions ahead and thus insure the prompt release of its features on definite dates without the necessity of hurried and inadequate work, should an unforeseen circumstance cause a temporary delay in the filming of any production.

According to an announcement just made the first production to be offered the public will be "Salomy Jane," as adapted from Paul Armstrong's dramatic version of Bret Harte's famous story. This play would appear as one of significant appropriateness as an initial release for any company bearing the name of the Golden State, since it is not only a story of the most romantic period of California's history, but, in its original book form, was from the pen of the most distinguished author of early California fiction, Bret Harte. A contract has been signed with both the Liebler Company and Paul Armstrong, giving the California Motion Picture Corporation the sole motion picture rights to "Salomy Jane."

The title role in the motion picture adaptation will be assumed by Beatriz Michelena, the beauiful and celebrated prima donna, the announcement of whose debut before the screen has already caused a sensation in theatrical circles.

A long list of critics throughout the country have credited Miss Michelena with being the most beautiful woman on the American operatic stage as well as an actress of extraordinary versatility. This, together with her youth and ideal size, form and animation for picture work, will establish her immediately as one of the greatest favorites in the silent drama. Her operatic work, and she was touring the country as prima donna in the Shubert's production, "Girl from Dixie" when but sixteen years of age, has featured her in some of the greatest successes ever staged in this country, including Kirk La Shelle's production, "Princess Chic," Henry Savage's "Peggy from Paris," Oliver Morosco's "Tik Tok Man of Oz" and John Cort's "Kissing Girl." Those who have watched her acting thus far declare that no part could be better adapted to her than that of the pretty and capricious "Salomy Jane."

Miss Michelena will be supported by one of the best balanced casts ever organized for motion pictures and included in it will be House Peters, late of Frohman's Famous Players. Other members of the notable cast are: Andrew Robson, William Nigh, Ernest Joy and Clara Beyers, all of whom have assumed leading roles when with other companies.

The California Motion Picture Corporation has been financed by a group of some of California's best known business men and capitalists. Among the stockholders and directors are: Herbert Payne, millionaire of Menlo Park; Henry T. Scott, president of the Mercantile National Bank; R. P. Schwerin, vice president and general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; Charles Templeton Crocker, owner of the St. Francis Hotel and director of the Crocker National Bank; Edwin M. Eddy of the Selwyn Eddy Estate Company; William F. Herrin, vice president and chief counsellor of the Southern Pacific; Christian de Guigne of the Parrott Estate; James Tyson, president of the Seaboard National Bank, and Arthur C. Payne of the Payne Estate. Alex E. Beyfuss is general manager of the Corporation.

To Feature Andrew Mack

Andrew Mack, the favorite interpreter of devil-may-care Irish roles on the speaking stage, will soon be seen in motion pictures through the medium of his famous success, "The Ragged Earl," which is now being produced as a feature on a lavish scale by Popular Plays and Players, Inc., of 1600 Broadway, New York City. Mr. Mack has held great popularity in this country and wherever the English language is spoken, including Great Britain and Australia, for many years through his ability to charm and entertain. He was born in Boston, Massachusetts. When a lad he sang soprano solos in the parish church and was in great demand for concerts and entertainments. At the age of twenty-four he attracted the attention of John Stetson, the old-time manager, who engaged him for a year and presented him to the patrons of the famous old Howard Athenaeum. After that Mr. Mack joined Thatcher and Ryan's Minstrels. He then engaged in dramatic work, where he soon achieved a high reputation. He appeared successfully in "The Ivy Leaf," "The Fairies' Well," "My Aunt Bridget," "A Jolly Surprise," and "Killarney." He next starred in Marcus Moriarty's "Irish Loyalty," and afterwards joined "A Country Sport." He next starred in W. J. Scanlon's play, "Myles Aroon," and after that under the management of Rich and Harris, in "An Irish Gentleman" and "The Ragged Earl," the play in which he will be seen in motion pictures. Since that time Mr. Mack has been starred in "Tom Moore," "Arrah-Na-Pogue" and "At Bay." He has toured this country times innumerable and also has toured England, Ireland and Australia, where he is a prime favorite.

Andrew Mack.

Twist Brings Suit

Stanly Twist, recently connected with the Australian Film Company as general manager of that concern's Australian studios, upon his return to the United States, read in a Cincinnati theatrical journal an article regarding his activities which he considers "false, untrue and seemingly malicious." Feeling that this article has been the cause of his failure to close up certain contracts for a production which he represents, and that the worry consequent thereto has seriously broken down his health, Mr. Twist has brought suit against the Cincinnati publication for $100,000 damages. The matter is now in the hands of Mr. Twist's attorney.

Pathe Players Enjoy Picnic

That motion picture actors and actresses enjoy a real old fashioned "good time" once in a while just as well as anyone else was clearly demonstrated on Sunday, June 14, when all the players of the Pathe Freres Company attended a picnic given by their employers at Greenwood Lake, N. J.

The party met at the studios about nine-thirty in the morning and motored to the lake, where dinner and supper was served at the Glen Airie hotel. A boat excursion around the lake took up most of the time between the meals and all of the players returned home in the evening declaring it had been a long time since they had spent such an enjoyable day.

Excelsior Release Excellent

The Excelsior Feature Film Company exhibited its first production, a four part drama, "The Toll of Mammon," at the New York Theater Friday morning, June 19.

The "toll" forms the basis of a heart gripping story founded on fact, a veritable tragedy resulting from the upsetting of family harmony by money, or the lack of it. The picture is full of action, the scenes realistic, and the settings luxurious or common as the case necessitates.

The motor boat explosion is one of the most complete and cleverly handled thrills of its kind that has been embodied in pictures. Beautiful exteriors were taken as the result of the company's stay at Lake Placid, New York. The photography is excellent, even, unspotted, and clear.

The story, directed and written by Harry Handworth, features Octavia Handworth, the former Pathe star, supported by a strong cast of well-known screen favorites, among whom are Tom Tempest, Gordon-DeMaine, and William A. Williams. Great credit is due them for the earnestness with which they play their parts, each one seeming to be keyed up to the spirit of the story, thus eliminating any chance of overplaying memorized parts.

Dr. John Wright is a young, rising physician. His wife, who has been raised in luxury, rebels at the comparatively poor surroundings in which she is compelled to live. This is the situation existing when the Wrights receive an invitation to a fashionable social event. The doctor insists on their attending and manages to secure a gown and some jewelry for his wife. At the ball the borrowed necklace disappears. The neighbor who had lent it to the doctor promises to consider the matter settled for the sum of $5,000 and takes Dr. Wright's note for the amount. Some time later the neighbor and two other men decide to exploit a fake tuberculosis cure and, while looking for a doctor whose endorsement will assure its sale, learn of a recent great surgical discovery made by Dr. Wright. They call on him and offer $50,000 for the use of his name. His wife pleads with him to accept, but he asks time to consider and analyze the cure. He finds it to be a fraud and refuses to endorse its use. Through his wife's love of luxury and the threat of foreclosing on the note the promoters induce the doctor to sacrifice his principles before Mammon, the god of riches.

The ingredients of the supposed cure cause the death of a number of those who seek relief through it, and the health authorities investigate. As a result a warrant is issued for the arrest of Dr. Wright and the promoters. In the meantime the doctor has gotten into a quarrel with the promoters and been shot, but the wound is not serious. He is kept a prisoner in the head promoter's house and his wife is notified that he has left town on an extended trip.

Some time later he escapes and, returning home meets the promoters. The arrival of the police interrupts any chance of a settlement of the ill feeling between them and, with but one thought in view, the four attempt to escape in a motor-boat, closely pursued by the police. A revolver battle ensues. Pierced by a bullet, the gasoline tank of the escaping boat explodes and the only survivor is Dr. Wright.

He is convicted and sent to prison, but is pardoned years afterward because of having contracted tuberculosis. In the meantime his child has died and his wife has been earning her living by sewing. She has had a long time to think of the cost of their short-lived luxury. She meets her husband at the prison gates on his release and together they journey to a sanatorium for the real cure—fresh air. One year later Dr. Wright is pronounced cured, and, with his wife starts on the uphill climb at which the story began many years before. The intermediate years of fraud and its payment represent "The Toll of Mammon."

Mutual Officers Re-elected

At the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Mutual Film Corporation, held in Richmond, Va., on June 17, five directors were elected. The outgoing directors, Crawford Livingston, Felix E. Kahn, George W. Hall, Wilbert Shallenberger and Eddison E. Jones, were unanimously re-elected for terms of three years each. A resolution was adopted by the stockholders approving the conduct of the corporation's business during the past year.

At the annual directors' meeting in New York on June 19, the treasurer's report showed the Mutual to be in a flourishing condition. Regular 7 per cent dividends on preferred stock for the year beginning July 1, 1914, were declared payable quarterly, and a dividend of one-half of 1 per cent with an extra dividend of one-half of 1 per cent on the common stock was declared payable in each of the next four months.

At the same meeting the officers were unanimously re-elected as follows: President and general manager, H. E. Aitken; first vice-president and treasurer, C. J. Hite; second vice-president, John R. Freuler, and secretary, E. L. Thomas. After the meeting President Aitken announced the appointment of James N. Naulty as third vice-president.

World Film and Shuberts Combine

One of the most gigantic and important alliances between the motion picture and theatrical interests ever attempted was formed on June 11 between the World Film Corporation and the Shubert Theatrical Company. The latter will be operated under the name of the Shubert Feature Film Corporation, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, controlling hundreds of plays, dramas, farces, comedies and big sensations. It is the purpose of this corporation to manufacture into moving pictures all the plays of the Shubert Theatrical Company and others that may be acquired by this firm.

A partial list of the productions affected by the alliance includes plays controlled by the Messrs. Shubert, William A. Brady, Charles E. Blaney, Cecil Spooner and Owen Davis. Among some of the best known productions to be filmed and shown by the new alliance are: The New York Hippodrome spectacle "America," the Drury Lane and Manhattan Opera House success "The Whip," "Bought and Paid For," "The Midnight Sons," "The Lure," "Baby Mine," "Girls," "Marcelle," "The Blue Mouse," "The Summer Widowers," "The Girl Behind the Counter," "The Blue Moon," "A Chinese Honeymoon," "The Earl and the Girl," "Way Down East," "Little Miss Brown," "Mother," "Little Women," "The Balkan Princess," "The Gentleman from Mississippi," "The Little Church Around the Corner," "Across the Pacific," "The Boy Detective," and hundreds of others.

The World Film Corporation, with a capital stock of $2,000,000, will exploit the product of the Shubert Feature Film Corporation through its well known organization comprising offices in all principal cities throughout the United States and Canada. Under the terms of the contract the World Film Corporation acquired a large interest in the Shubert Feature Film Corporation which in turn received a generous block of the World Film Corporation's stock. The active officers have not as yet been elected, but it is announced this election will take place in the very near future.

All of the stock in the new corporation has been bought by the banking firms of Edward B. Smith & Co. of New York and Philadelphia, Huhn, Edey & Co. of New York, and George A. Huhn & Sons of Philadelphia.

Among the directors of the combination are Lee Shubert, George B. Cox, Frederick Edey, of Huhn, Edey & Co., Herbert H. Dean of Edward B. Smith & Co., George A. Huhn of Philadelphia, Joseph L. Rhinok, Van Horn Ely of National Properties Company, New York and Pittsburgh, and William Alden Pratt of Edward B. Smith & Co.

The present policy of the combination is to release a feature per week. In addition to the above, arrangements have been made by the World Film Corporation with the McEnnery Syndicate of London and New York to market all features produced by it.

4877 Wins Solax Prize

At the Solax booth during the Motion Picture Exposition at Grand Central Palace, the Blaché studios put up a beautiful large bronze statue as a prize for the holder of the lucky number. Every afternoon and evening during the exposition cards were distributed bearing duplicate numbers, and on Saturday night at 9:30 Claire Whitney drew from a basket five numbers, the fifth being declared the winner of the prize.

Madame Alice Blaché, president of the Solax Company, estimated that at least 10,000 numbers had been distributed and returned to the booth by the time of the drawing, which made the winning of the statue a 10,000-to-1 shot. The fifth number drawn, which was 4,877, proved to be the number held by Edward Reilly of the Gaumont Company, whose home is at 154 Broadway, Flushing, Long Island. He was not at the Exposition at the time of the drawing, but was immediately communicated with by 'phone and advised to play the races for the balance of his days.

Kleine Issues Annual Catalogue

The 20th annual edition of the Kleine Optical Company catalogue is just off the press and ready for distribution. It contains one hundred and seventy-five pages, printed on a highly enameled stock and bound in dainty blue "Advertiser's Cover." The catalogue this year contains many valuable treatises on Lenses, Theater Construction and Kindred Subjects in addition to a complete list of Motion Picture Accessories and Supplies of all kinds. It is by far the most comprehensive book of its kind ever issued.

Buys Film Rights to Brady Books

The Vitagraph Company of America has purchased from Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady, the eminent divine and author, the rights to three of his best novels. They are "The Fetters of Freedom," "Sir Henry Morgan, Buccaneer," and "The Chalice of Courage."

"The Fetters of Freedom" is a strong religious novel dealing with the life and work of Paul, the Apostle, in his conflict with the Pagan Roman Emperor, Nero.

"Sir Henry Morgan, Buccaneer," is a gripping narrative of the deeds of the famous old pirate and promises to make a tremendous photoplay. The third book, "The Chalice of Courage," is a tale of the mingling of the East and the West, in which the best part of both sections is brought to the fore. The principal scenes of "The Chalice" are laid in the West and this play will be enacted by the Vitagraph California company under the direction of Mr. Sturgeon, who so successfully staged "Captain Alvarez."

The three plays will be made into picture form by Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady, late of the United States Army, but now a member of the Vitagraph's staff. By a strange coincidence, the author of the books and Colonel Brady are brothers, and this means that the combined talent ought to make some productions out of the ordinary.

The staging of these pieces will be under the watchful eyes of J. Stuart Blackton and A. E. Smith.

Nash and Otto Form Producing Co.

One of the significant announcements among the many important ones that have occurred recently in the motion picture industry is that Thomas Nash, and "Big" Otto, both formerly of the Selig Polyscope Company have formed a company of their own to manufacture big feature pictures.

The new company has adopted for its immediate policy, the production of big wild animal features, averaging from three to five reels in length, and produced along elaborate lines with careful attention to detail. For this purpose the new company has purchased an extensive tract of land, about half way between Los Angeles and Pasadena, California.

At present a large force of men are hustling to completion the extensive work of beautifying these grounds and establishing suitable studio and manufacturing facilities.

A large and carefully selected company is already working on the first picture, to be called "The Mysterious Man of the Jungle." This feature will be in four reels and no expense is being spared to make it set a high standard among wild animal productions.

Another Mary Pickford Triumph

Another Mary Pickford achievement will be released on July 1, when the Famous Players Film Company presents this captivating young star in the stirring drama of splendid emotions and heroic action, "The Eagle's Mate," by Anna Alice Chapin, which, as a novel, has been tremendously popular.

The story tells how a little society girl finds her way into the West Virginia hills and after overcoming her disgust at the mode of life of the people there becomes so attached to them that she gives up all that she holds dear to stay with them.

Old Scouts Meet

Fifty-one years ago, a Confederate scout lay all night in a shallow creek watching the Union lines. A Yankee sentinel watched him and was prepared to shoot if the Confederate moved. A meeting that vividly brought back the thrilling days of the civil war and particularly this hair-raising incident, when they were enemies and fought each other for the glory of the blue or the gray, occurred several days ago when Scout W. H. Taylor and D. R. Crane recognized each other on a mimic battlefield at the Universal Film Manufacturing Company's ranch near Los Angeles, California.

At their meeting in that memorable second year of the war, Taylor, a Confederate scout, was following the Union lines in retreat from Pine Run, Virginia, after an attempt to reach Richmond. Taylor, seeking information, started to cross a creek, but seeing Union sentinels on the bank, hid all day in the shallow water, waiting for night. He finally escaped with such information as he could gather.

Crane, in General Meade's army, patroled the bank all day, waiting for a sight of the spy he had suspected.

At the recent meeting the two veterans went over the details of the night and the battles that followed. Both men were weary and sun-burned, they had been living over again some of the battles they had been in years before. These battles were to be part of one of the Universal war dramas. And the surprising feature of the meeting was that it was not the first mimic battle they had been in; both had been working for the same company for twelve months and had never met, until that day. Taylor is employed as a military and woodcraft expert, at Universal City, and Crane as an actor at the Hollywood studios.

The two old veterans meet.

Bergen Heads Wharton Players

Theodore W. and Leopold Wharton, heads of Wharton, Inc., prominent as motion picture directors, have secured Thurlow Bergen, as leading man for the feature productions which that company is now making at its studios in Ithaca, New York.

PERSONAL NOTES.

Manager Joseph Shear of Solax and Blaché Features has returned from Mexico with Director Harry Schenck and a large company of Solax players, including Miss Vinnie Burns who has the distinction of being the only woman to actually enter the fighting zone in Mexico and experience the sensation of being under fire. Miss Burns proudly exhibits a bullet which ploughed up the ground within three feet of her, passing between her horse and the horse of Mr. Schenck, who rode beside her. The company entered Mexico by way of Eagle Pass, Texas, and made their way under a strong guard furnished by General Francisco Murguia of Villa's army to Monclova. It took them fifteen hours to make the trip by train, as the rails had been torn up and the bridges burned so recently that the temporary roadbed made traveling extra slow and hazardous. They arrived in Monclova without interference, thanks to the alertness of heavily armed soldiers who rode upon the engine and the platforms of the coaches. In Monclova the company members were commanded not to venture outside of their lodgings, and Miss Burns' thrilling experiences were due to her disregard of orders and her determination to accompany Director Schenck and Camera-man Charley Pin upon their quest for war scenes. They not only succeeded in getting motion pictures of the battle of Monclova, but also several hundred feet of films showing the departure of trains loaded with the troops bound for Mexico City, where the decisive battle of the war is in preparation.

Harry Schenck.

"Big" Otto has been a well known figure in the animal and circus world for two decades. About five years ago he brought his collection of animals to Chicago and became associated with the Selig Polyscope Company. It was shortly after this that he helped materially in what was considered to be the first wild animal picture that was ever produced. This picture opened up a new field of production, and from that time on until the date of his resignation on May first, Mr. Otto assisted in practically all of the Selig animal productions. In his new company Mr. Otto will personally supervise all productions. With this combination in the field, the trade will look forward eagerly to the product, and already letters and wires are pouring in to the company's new offices in Los Angeles and Mr. Twist's office in New York, requesting information as to what channel the new brand will be marketed through. Mr. Twist states that, despite the tempting offers which have been received, no definite policy of marketing will be decided upon until after Mr. Nash arrives in New York next month with his first sample pictures.

W. W. Johnson, who handles the publicity and advertising on "The Perils of Pauline" series, has an unreleased 30 feet of the seventh episode which he ran lately in the Eclectic projection room. The Safety First Society rather than the censors should pass on it. The picture is of Francis Carlyle's fall from the top of a staircase while carrying Pearl White on his shoulder.

Philip Lonergan's chances of being a stranger to any of the Thanhouser players are few. In fun a friend recently tried to introduce him to one of their leading men but was met with the discouraging reply, "Do I know him? You bet, he's the fellow that has me risking my life by sliding down coal chutes and things." One of Mr. Lonergan's favorite ways of showing friendship is by putting a fellow in a picture where he gets an opportunity to run a race with the water in a sluice, sit in a suspended coal scoop and carry on a revolver fight with pursuers, or some other such pastime. A few of his latest Thanhouser scenarios are: "For Her Child," two reels; "The Widow's Mite," one reel; "The Girl Across the Hall," one reel; the Princess single reels, "The Toy Shop," "His Enemy," and "Professor Snaith."

Henry Hallam was one of the Kalemites whose early morning sleep was being bothered by the monotonous chirping of the sparrows around Kalem House, so when the society for elimination of the nuisance sprung up he was one of the first to volunteer his services. In pulling down one of the nests he noticed that it was unusually heavy but attributing it to an extra heavy crop of eggs, he started to pull it apart when out shot the head of a moccasin. The moccasin is one variety of snake that doesn't know how to take a joke, so after its demise Hallam kept the skin as a souvenir.

Bessie Learn's spare time lately has been put in studying maps and railway guides. A contemplated two months vacation in Europe is the cause of all this anxiety for foreign knowledge. Her original plans were to vacation around the U. S. but she discovered that, during her stage career, she had seen everything of importance or interest in this country. So, having conquered all the curiosity that the U. S. held for her she carries her conquest over the sea.

"Bob" Vignola, Kalem director, is through joking with that Jacksonville company. When he left for Albany some time ago he informed them that he was "wife-hunting." The greeting on his return was all that could be expected—more than he expected. At the depot was a car decorated with a "Just Married" sign; at his apartment everything was done up in mourning, the guests even carrying black-bordered handkerchiefs. This was not only going him one more, but six or seven on his own joke. For consolation he dug into work and turned out a two-reeler in record time.

Bennie of Lubinville pleads guilty to a grouchy publication called The Betzwood Lenz, which rails up, down, and across every member of the Philadelphia company who has incurred his personal displeasure in the past year. It contains a laugh in every paragraph. For "info" about who's who and why at Lubin's, get a line on Bennie.

Harry Weiss, of Chicago, has been made district manager for the World Film Corporation, with offices at 37 South Wabash avenue.

Harry Carey's character as "The Master Cracksman," in the photoplay of that name, automatically gave him the unbounded pleasure (?) of being the companion of a band of hobos. Realism was needed in the scene showing Carey as a true "knight of the road," so, after a good bit of persuasion, backed by financial inducements, a band of tramps agreed to adopt Carey as a member and allow themselves to be photographed. The result is worthy the trouble, but Harry says "never again." If a certain class of people want to cook their food in tin cans, grow whiskers, and avoid soap, that's their business. But Harry wishes to be excused.

Harry Reichenbach, he of the publicity end of the Lasky Feature Play Company, received a gold watch from the convention committee as a "Thank-you" tribute for his helpful share in the management of the motion picture convention just terminated in New York. Some words of praise addressed to "Our Harry" and signed by the names of the committee of six fit nicely within the back cover of the watch. The recipient rejoices that there were not two more on the committee or he might not have received the watch.

Harry J. Cohen, general manager of the Popular Plays and Players Company in the Mecca Building, followed convention week with a trip to Chicago and was back in New York on Monday.

Stanly Twist is back in the eastern film center, and when he is to be found in the offices of the Inter-Ocean company in the World's Tower it is in the room with his name on the door and the caution "Private." Mr. Twist received a happy welcome from the many who knew him, on his recent arrival in New York.

The Cincinnati branch of the World Film Corporation will be under the supervision of Clay E. Brehm, formerly manager of their New York exchange. H. G. Siegel, formerly manager of the Cosmos Feature Film Company, has been named as Mr. Brehm's successor.

Pearl White, now generally known as "Pauline," owing to the popularity of the "Perils of Pauline," is the subject matter of a two-page interview, finely illustrated, in the July number of the Cosmopolitan.

Because an excited spectator kicked the motion picture camera and spoiled the original picture, Eddie Gordon of the Blaché Company, was forced to repeat a dangerous plunge into the Hudson River on a motorcycle to furnish a thrilling climax for the four-reel photodrama entitled "The Yellow Traffic."

George J. Beihoff, formerly district manager of the World Film Corporation in Indianapolis, has been transferred to Philadelphia, in the same capacity.

"The Greyhound," Paul Armstrong's gripping deep sea drama, is enjoying a highly successful run at the Strand Theater, New York City. All of the characters which were made so impressive on the legitimate stage have been faithfully transferred to the screen and the film bids fair to outshine the original work.

E. Mandelbaum has sold his interests in the World Film Corporation, and will devote some of his time and energy in the producing end of the business. There are a number of new branches in the film industry, which Mr. Mandelbaum has under consideration, and it is predicted when these mature something new and novel will be shown the trade. Mr. Mandelbaum will make his headquarters for some time to come at the office of the World Film Corporation, 130 West Forty-sixth street, New York city.

Gabriel Pollock, who for some time has been general scenic director for the Selig studios in Chicago recently left for the California plant of that company taking with him a carload of "property" recently purchased from the Chicago Auditorium Association. This papier-mache work is of most remarkable character, and was made by Robinson of Drury Lane, London. By a curious coincidence, Mr. Pollock, as a boy apprentice, happened to be employed in the Auditorium at the time it was first purchased and assisted in fabricating some of these "properties."

Paul West's series, based on his stories of the alert office boy and to be known as "Bill," will be released by the Komic Company of the Mutual program earlier than was at first announced, July 5 being the date now set for the first picture. Other reels will follow at frequent intervals. "Bill" is a one reel feature and each consecutive reel will be complete, though there will be consecutive interest.

Pretty little Ella Hall, so long a favorite ingenue with the Rex company has been selected as leading woman in the Robert Leonard Rex company.

Arthur N. Smallwood addressed the tenth annual convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of America at Toronto, Canada, June 22, on the uses of motion pictures in advertising and selling. Mr. Smallwood used a Power's Cameragraph Six A to project motion pictures which his concern has made of many commercial enterprises.

Sam J. Ryan, a former member of the "Lewis and Ryan" vaudeville team and who is now with the Pathe forces is good for a laugh every time he appears on the screen. Most of Ryan's experience was gained on the variety stage but he also has a record of six seasons with George Cohan in musical comedy.

Since the combination between the World Film Corporation, and the Shubert interests a booking department has been formed at the offices of the Corporation, 130 West 46th street, New York, under the supervision of I. H. Simmons, formerly of the Shubert Feature Film Booking Company.

Myrtle Stedman has been reveling in a couple of comedy parts in photoplays put on by Charles Hayden of Bosworth Inc. These comedies were put on as "fillers" during the preparations for the next big Jack London production. Most of Miss Stedman's private time is taken up with singing engagements for she is continually practising.

Two Power's Six A motion picture machines have been installed at Ebbett's ball park, Brooklyn, N. Y., by the Marcus Loew circuit.

W. S. Nast, who will be remembered by theatergoers for his strong and convincing work in the original productions of "The Squaw Man" and "The Virginian," has been added to one of the companies used in producing the plays put out under the Kay Bee, Domino and Broncho brands by the New York Motion Picture Corporation. He will be featured during the summer in a series of stories by Director General Thomas H. Ince.

The Victor company, with Florence Lawrence and Matt Moore in the leads, is now at Duck Island, off the coast of Connecticut, where a number of dramas and comedies are being produced in the open. A feature of the trip, part of which will be in one of the pictures, which recently took place, was a twelve hour launch trip during which Miss Lawrence cooked the meals for her companions on an oil stove.

Hunter Bennett, who has been on the road ever since his connection with the World Film Corporation, is now located at the home office as assistant to the general manager, Lewis J. Selznick. Hard work and sound judgment in organizing out-of-town offices are the qualities which have brought Mr. Bennett to this position of responsibility.

An unbroken week of sunshine has been experienced at Santa Barbara, California. Almost the entire year has been a disappointment with reference to the weather because the sun has been so unreliable, and evasive. When no one can bank on what the day will bring, one will realize what the present high rate of sunlight efficiency means to the directors of the "Flying A" and "Beauty" companies.

Charles Bennett, of the Keystone company, was educated for the law and used to go play-acting at nights, his parents little suspecting his duplicity. What is more, he made his start with Edwin Booth, in what capacity we will not question. He appeared with Booth later in larger parts.

Alexandra Phillips Fahrney, actress and photo-playwright, was the first writer of "scenarios" to get her name flashed on the screen—quite a distinction, by the way. This very clever lady is now in New York and her name should be included in the list of famous writers of photoplays. That it never has been is because she has never sought self-advertisement.

A brand new animal picture, its main plot centering about the life of the circus, with its sawdust rings and tight ropes, is the proposition upon which Director Fred Wright of Pathe is now working. The film is booked for release the latter part of the summer.

Frank Crane, director of Imp dramas, has had little difficulty during the past few days in living up to his title of "S. P. D." (soft pedal director). Frank's wife is in the St. Elizabeth Hospital, New York, where she has just undergone a major operation. Mrs. Crane has been seen on the screen on numerous occasions, though she is not by profession an actress. Frank reports that she is doing well at present.

William D. Taylor is producing "The Judge's Wife" at the Balboa studios, featuring pretty and clever little Neva Delorez. This is Taylor's first try at the producing end, although he has stage managed for the legitimate a-plenty. There is little doubt he will make good, for he has a wealth of experience and much gray matter at his command.

Jack Blystone is now directing Bess Meredyth in her comedies at the Universal. Jack is a splendid fellow and has worked himself up steadily, and he has the full advantage of Bess Meredyth's help. She is at present acting a sort of Sis Hopkins part and she is at her funniest when impersonating country maidens. She says that Blystone is going to make a good director.

"The Crash," a one-reel comedy, is the first to be produced by George Nichols, for nine months prominent director with the Keystone company, who recently joined the Universal-Sterling company to direct a third producing company.

When the S. S. Olympic pulled out of the New York harbor, Saturday, June 20, it carried Samuel S. Hutchinson of the American Film Company, and his wife and two sons. Mr. Hutchinson will be abroad until September and plans to visit all of the larger cities of Europe, where he will transact business. His family accompanies him to relieve the monotony of solitary travel.

G. L. P. Vernon, president of the World Film Corporation, has just returned from Europe, where he has been for the past three months. During his stay abroad he formed a twenty-million dollar corporation for exploiting films in Europe. As it will be necessary for him to devote his entire attention to this corporation, he will resign his office with the World Film Corporation and return to London next week. Arrangements have been made between the World Film Corporaion and Mr. Vernon whereby the World features will be handled by him throughout Europe, and his features by the World Film Corporation throughout the United States and Canada.

Jacques Jacquard is now co-director with Jack Warren Kerrigan of the Kerrigan Victor company of the Universal. The famous star will hereafter be seen in both society and Western dramas, in order that the varying tastes of his many admirers may be satisfied.

Frank Motgomery of the Kalem company has had numerous letters asking for fuller particulars regarding his song competition. The offer is short and simple, $75 for first prize and $25 for second, for the words and music of an Indian song with Mona Darkfeather featured. Two verses and chorus are suggested. The time limit for submitting songs has not been definitely settled as yet.

Francis Ford put on a ballroom scene in "Lucille Love" this week, which is one of the deepest "sets" ever attempted. In this scene a regular cabaret performance by well known people was given and Grace Cunard, in very filmy dance raiment, impersonates a dancer in order to fascinate Lebeque (Mr. Ford). The scenes were directed in a masterly manner, Mr. Ford's specialty being big things.

A bit of almost too realistic real life entered into Allen Curtis' most recent Joker comedy, "His Wife's Family." The location chosen was one in the rougher part of Los Angeles. If there were such things as loafers, bums and thugs in that fair ctiy of Los Angeles they could be found at precisely the corner which Director Curtis decided was the only one that would do. As the story ran, Mr. Asher, as the hero, was to come out of the saloon almost completely under the influence of John Barleycorn. Max did, or rather he came out with the appearance of being intoxicated; but directly after him came three gentlemen of decidedly questionable sobriety. Max did his exit properly and was once more himself, but the trio swayed uncertainly, started to follow, when suddenly their befuddled senses realized the camera's presence. They hesitated, then stumbled back into the saloon with: "Thish bad. Don' wan' picher ta'en like thish!"

Edna Maison is acting opposite Robert Leonard in a Parisian artist's picture this week, and it gives her the opportunity of showing how "chic" she looks in French garments and tremendous creations in the form of hats which are balanced over one ear. In fact, the hats comprise the most solid part of Edna's garments, but she makes a mighty attractive young artist.

The Lubin baseball team will play the Edison baseball club on the Edison Bronx grounds July 4. A special train has been chartered by the Lubin rooters, with John R. Ince as cheer leader. Many of the Lubinites will motor over from Philadelphia in their cars. It is the desire of G. N. Strelfield, manager of the Lubin team, to arrange baseball games with the employes of the various motion picture plants, and all challenges should be addressed to him at the Lubin studio, Philadelphia.

Pauline Bush is back at work again at the Universal studio and just in time to play opposite Murdock Macquarrie in "The Life of Francois Villon," from the book of George Bronson Howard, put into scenario form by Dr. Stafford. The first installment will be in three reels, with ten two-reelers to follow. Both Mr. Macquarrie and Miss Bush have parts well suited to them. Charles Giblin is directing.

Robert Brower, of the Edison company, is the proud possessor of a new Studebaker automobile.

Peter Lang, after a three month's vacation, is back at the Lubin studio, the old home in Philadelphia.

W. H. Bomb, formerly representative of the Syndicate Film Corporation in the New Orleans territory, has been succeeded by M. W. Lawrence.

Anna Luther, one of the Lubin leading women, has been called the best amateur tango dancer in America. Her latest cup was won in a contest in the ballroom of the Hotel Rudolph in Atlantic City, two weeks ago, when she and her partner out-danced forty-three other couples. She was made a very flattering offer to remain at one of Atlantic City's largest hotels all summer to dance, but explained satisfactorily to all concerned that dancing is with her only a side issue.

Among the important actors who appear in the photoplay production of Upton Sinclair's novel, "The Jungle," which will be the attraction at Weber's theater, beginning Monday, June 22, are George Nash, Gail Kane, Robert Cummings, Clarence Handyside, Alice Marc, Julia R. Hurley, May McCabe, Robert Payton Gibbs, and Upton Sinclair himself.

James M. Sheldon, president of the Syndicate Film Corporation, has returned from the South, bringing fine reports of the activity among exhibitors to book and boost "The Million Dollar Mystery."

Ormi Hawley has discovered a reliable antifat, the formula of which she will give free to her sister artists. She calles it "WORKANWALK."

Milton H. Fahrney, the well-known director, the first the Nestor company ever had, and Alexandra Phillips Fahrney, left Los Angeles for New Jersey on Friday, the former to direct six reel features and the latter to write special photoplays. They suffered a pang or two at leaving their very beautiful home in Hollywood, but they promise to be back again in a few months' time.

Burton King had a lively day recently. He put on a one-reeler called "Influence of a Pup," and had one child who was full of mischief, another who had never acted before and was shy, a spaniel whose one idea was to get out of the scene, and a bull pup who wanted to chew the spaniel. How on earth King got it is hard to imagine, but he did all right.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believeing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in MOTOGRAPHY as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

World's Greatest Film is Screened

"Cabiria" A Masterpiece

MR. WEBSTER'S well known dictionary is pitifully inadequate when it comes to supplying adjectives with which to describe "Cabiria," now playing at the Illinois theater, Chicago, the stupendous film offering of the Itala Film Company of Torino, Italy, the story of which is from the pen of Gabriele D'Annunzio. One sits spellbound through the entire three acts and five episodes necessary for the telling of the story, and when the curtain falls at the end feels speechless with awe, for never before have film patrons been offered such a tremendous triumph of motion picture art, never have they beheld such awe-inspiring panoramas outspread before their eyes, never have they seen such spectacular battles or witnessed more massively staged productions. "Cabiria" is the last word in motion pictures—it is the great ultimate beyond which it seems impossible for any manufacturer to go—if one may be permitted to appropriate a word or two from the lexicon of Messrs. Barnum and Bailey it is "the world's greatest" film.

The Gigantic Temple of Moloch.
From the First Scene of the Itala Masterpiece "Cabiria."

From the moment when the first scene—one showing the interior of the temple of the great bronze god, Moloch, where helpless infants are burned alive as sacrifices to the pagan god—is flashed on the screen up to the final subtitle, "the end," action of a most amazing sort is holding your attention. During the production you are taken from the Sicilian city of Catana, which you see destroyed by an eruption of Mount Etna and an earthquake, to ancient Carthage, and from there whisked away to the Alps, where you behold Hannibal accomplishing his history-making descent upon Rome. Next you find yourself beholding the siege of Syracuse and watching Archimedes burning the Roman fleet with his gigantic mirror. You follow the wanderings of Fulvius Axilla, the hero of the tale, returning again to Catana and from there journey again to Carthage, which is by now besieged. Ere the film ends you gaze upon the burning deserts, across which the army of Syphax, king of Cirta, is slowly making its way, and the finish finds you aboard the Roman fleet, returning again to Italy.

The entrance to the palace of Hasdrubel, one of the tremendously big sets.

The gigantic temples, enormous palaces and barbaric reception halls must be seen to be appreciated, for nothing approaching their massiveness and depth has ever been shown on motion picture screens before. One is given an awe-inspiring view of a temple, so gigantic in size that the worshippers within its portals look like pygmies, and while one is yet gasping open-mouthed at the daring of the director who undertook the filming of such a stupendous panorama, the camera is moved slowly to one side or the other and one discovers that the first view of the temple was but a fragmentary one, and that now the scene has been more than trebled in size.

This trick of the director's in moving the camera about is a most surprising one and opens up many new possibilities for the pictures. Heretofore when the camera shifted from one viewpoint to another it has always been thought necessary to stop the camera and begin a new scene in the second location, but when one can shift the picture-taking apparatus as cleverly as does the Itala director, without causing any flicker or strain on the eyes, it is far preferable to adopt the method used in "Cabiria." One gets the impression that he has, himself, walked from one portion of the temple to another, and the effect is not only most convincing and life-like, but also helps the audience to more clearly fix the location of things in mind.

The scenes depicting the eruption of Mount Etna are wonderful in the extreme, and these alone would make "Cabiria" an extraordinary picture, but when one is taken down into the city of Catana and watches the earth split open before his very eyes, sees the sparks from the volcano falling all about him, and finally witnesses the crumbling of huge buildings, the fall of lofty columns and the collapse of gigantic structures, one feels speechless with awe.

Little less surprising is the attack upon the walled city of Carthage and the spectacular defense of those atop the walls. One beholds ladder after ladder thrust up toward the ramparts, watches scores of Roman soldiers climb the ladders and leap upon the parapets only to be hurled backward and to fall maimed and injured below. Huge rocks, molten metal, spears, javelins, bows and arrows, swords and battle axes, are used by the defenders of the city, while the attacking troops make use of many odd methods for reaching the enemy atop the city wall.

Beautiful in the extreme are the scenes depicting Hannibal's crossing of the Alps. The snow shimmering in the moonlight, while across its smooth surface one beholds an army of thousands steadily advancing, is a picture one cannot forget in a hurry, though closely approaching it in beauty is the one showing the desert at night, with hundreds of camels plodding slowly along against the distant sky-line. A perfect wave of applause, evoked by the beauty of these scenes, sweeps over the house at every performance when this particular part of the picture is reached. Still another scene that lingers with one long after leaving the theater is the boudoir of Sophonisba, with its sparkling pool, fed from a splashing fountain at one side, its gorgeous rugs and the lithe beauty of the leopard which majestically struts past the camera now and again.

So much space has been devoted to a mention of the spectacular scenes and tremendous settings of "Cabiria" that little remains in which to praise the players, but one cannot stop without mentioning that a more superbly balanced production has seldom if ever been offered—each player is an artist, indeed, and all make the most of the parts assigned them. Fulvius and his giant slave, Maciste, are indeed cast in the mold of heroes, while Cabiria, grown to womanhood, is so beautiful that one cannot wonder Fulvius was willing to risk his life for her. Sophonisba's beauty and grace easily account for her power in shaping the affairs of her country, and the death scene, in which she swallows the poison given her by the Numidian king, was a powerful bit of acting. Mention should also be made of Bodastoret, the wineshop keeper, for better character work one will never find on the picture screen.

When the Roman Empire, at its mightiest, in the third century before Christ, was fighting the rival empires of Carthage and Greece, the story begins:

Cabiria, a beautiful little girl, was saved from death by her nurse on the day when Catana, a city in Sicily, suffered from an eruption of Mount Etna and by an earthquake. The father, Batto, believed her to have perished in the ruins of their house, but she was taken to the seashore by the nurse and they found refuge on an apparently abandoned boat. The boat belonged to Phoenician pirates who had landed to cut wood. Upon their return the pirates took Cabiria and her nurse prisoners, and conveyed them to Carthage. The girl was sold in the slave market to the high priest Karthalo, who desired her for the purpose of offering her up as a sacrifice to the god Moloch.

On the day set for the sacrifice the nurse tried to save the child, pretending that she was infirm and consequently not acceptable to the god. The fraud was discovered and the nurse was flogged by scourges and left unconscious. She met a Roman patrician, Fulvius Axilla, and his powerful slave, Maciste, who were living secretly in Carthage, watching the movements of the rival republic.

Hearing of Cabiria's plight, the two Romans went to the Temple, mingling therein with the faithful shortly before the ceremony. At the moment when the high priest raised Cabiria to cast her through a vast opening in the idol, wherein a seething fire was burning, the slave, Maciste, rushed forward, overcame the priest and carried off the child, followed by the patrician, Fulvius. The nurse was caught, however, and killed.

Fulvius from his hiding place hearing that the great general, Hannibal, "The Sword of Carthage," had crossed the Alps and was menacing Rome, decided to escape from Carthage in order to reach Rome before the siege. Favored by darkness, he escaped by plunging into the sea and swimming out to a boat. Maciste hid in a garden with his charge.

At that moment Sophonisba, daughter of Hasdrubal, chief of the Carthaginian Republic, and her intended husband, Massinissa, the Numidian King, were in the garden, and they came suddenly upon him. Maciste pleaded with them to save Cabiria from sacrifice.

Overcome by pity, Sophonisba took Cabiria to her father's palace and there secreted her. The slave, Maciste, was made a prisoner and condemned to remain his whole life attached by chains to the arm of a millstone.

Cabiria became the slave of her savior, and was renamed Elissa. Fulvius, arriving in Rome from Carthage, joined the proconsul, Marcelle, in the siege of Syracuse. Archimedes, a captive Greek, by means of rays of light reflected from mirrors, caused the Roman fleet, with which Fulvius was sailing, to burn to the water's edge. Fulvius saved himself by swimming to the coast, where he subsequently reached the house of Cabiria's parents, whom he told that the child still lived. He promised to save her if fate allowed him to return to Carthage.

Fate favored Fulvius by placing him among the commanders of Scipio during the siege of Carthage. One night he penetrated unobserved into the city to explore the enemy's defenses. Returning to a tavern he formerly frequented, he obtained news of his slave, Maciste, whom he released from the millstone. Reunited, Fulvius and Maciste returned to Hannibal's camp. On the way they were intercepted by the army of Syphax, King of Cirta, an ally of the Carthaginians, and were locked in the cellar of Hasdrubal's palace, condemned to die of thirst.

A slave girl, taking pity on them, gave them water to drink through the iron bars. The slave was Cabiria, but they did not recognize her.

Sophonisba, the daughter of Hasdrubal, disturbed by dreams, was convinced that her country's misfortune—(Carthage being besieged by the Romans)—was due to the wrath of the god Moloch. She believes this was her punishment for having taken from him the victim destined for him.

Sophonisba confided in the priest, Karthalo, and presented Elissa to him. The priest recognized in her the little Cabiria who was torn away from him ten years before in the temple by the Roman slave Maciste.

Maciste, from a hiding place, heard the interview between the priest and the girl and learned that she was Cabiria, now grown to beautiful womanhood.

He heard the priest tell Cabiria the price she must pay to him for her life. Without warning Maciste intervened and killed the high priest. He and Fulvius were again overpowered by force of numbers and Elissa was sent back to Sophonisba.

This Queen poisoned herself rather than submit to the Roman yoke, and as a reward to Fulvius, who gave her the poison, restored Elissa to him. The war ended. The Roman vessels again sailed over the sea where the naval victories proclaimed Rome's triumph. On one of the vessels Fulvius and Cabiria returned to Italy, where they were united in marriage.

The cast is as follows:

The American rights to the picture are controlled by the Itala Company, of which Harry R. Raver is the American director general, while the tour is under the direction of Louis F. Werba and Mark A. Luescher. J. J. McCarthy is acting as business manager of Messrs. Werba and Leuscher during the Chicago showing of the film.

Compelled to Race With Death

Pauline Escapes Unharmed

IN the eighth episode of "The Perils of Pauline" the pretty heroine finds dangers of a much different character from those encountered in the effete East, but equally perilous in every way.

A large encampment of Indians plays a prominent part in this release, and the promptings of their superstitious beliefs introduce a genuine thrill—a race down the hillside between Pauline and a huge bowlder, which Pauline escapes by a matter of inches.

In the present episode all of the principal characters are in the West with one exception, Owen, the instigator of the attempts against Pauline's life, and the trend of the story in the last reel leads us to believe that he will soon be on the ground.

At the end of the seventh episode we left Pauline bound in a cave. She manages to free herself and tries to remove the stones that were placed against the opening but is unsuccessful, and gives up hope of escaping when she discovers the presence of a coyote in the cave. The animal disappears and Pauline, knowing that there must be another opening, makes a thorough examination of her prison and finds the passage leading to the open. She crawls through and surprises some Indians who are hunting in the vicinity by coming, as they think, out of the solid earth.

Previous to this the medicine man of an Indian village had prophesied the coming of a golden-haired goddess who would lead them successfully in battle against the white man. The Indians think she is the after her, if it rolls over her without doing her harm she is proven to be the true goddess.

In the meantime Harry has been summoned from New York. He enlists in the hunt for Pauline, and, while scouring the country meets a half-breed who tells him of the test that Pauline is receiving. Harry rushes to the scene and arrives just before Pauline starts on the hopeless race. Half-way up the hill he conceals himself at one side and awaits Pauline's descent. Just as she is opposite him he throws her a rope and pulls her out of the path of the boulder, which goes bounding past, missing her by but a few feet. Arriving at the Haines ranch house Harry and Pauline receive a true western welcome, in which all take part, from owner to lowest paid ranch-hand.

Harry rescues Pauline from certain death.

Bombardment Caused Thrills

The populace of Fort Lee, N. J., awoke one day this week to find a Franco-German village in their midst and were unable to figure out the reason until Will S. Davis, director for Ramo Films, Incorporated, swept his French and German troops with their horses and cannon through its streets, bombarding its houses and terrifying its citizens.

The scenes enacted were for the five-reel feature. "The Conquerors," dramatized by Paul M. Potter, and produced as a photo-drama by Ramo Films, Incorporated. Much time, care and money has been expended in making this production very elaborate and spectacular. The building of the miniature village alone cost over $3,000.

"The Conquerors," as a play, was dramatized by Mr. Potter for Charles Frohman, who produced it several years ago with William Faversham in the leading role, and it ran very successfully for one whole season at the Empire Theater, New York city. This production will be presented to the public September 1, and each month thereafter one just as good, such as the following: "The Victoria Cross," "The Destruction of St. Pierre," "The Mad Muliah" or "The Lovers of the Nile," "The City Directory," etc., all from Mr. Potter's pen.

Another Vitagraph Wreck

The Vitagraph Company went itself one better at Milltown, N. J., on Sunday, June 21, when it photographed what is considered one of the greatest railroad accidents ever enacted for motion pictures. The train, consisting of an engine and three coaches, was toppled down a forty-foot embankment and the engine demolished while the cars took fire and burned to ashes. The scene will be used in "Four Thirteen," a stirring sensational melodrama soon to be released and which outdoes the former railroad picture of this company, "The Wreck."

The fact that the train was to be wrecked was kept exceedingly quiet, as Ralph Ince, the director, feared a crowd would gather and spoil the picture. Despite this, however, about one thousand people from the vicinity lined the ravine, but all sought shelter when the wreckage started to fly.

To Remain with Famous Players

Following the rumors that she is soon to leave the Famous Players Company and join another well known film organization, Miss Mary Pickford, the dainty little star who is known to screen fans throughout the world as "Little Mary," has issued an emphatic denial and states that she appreciates the advantage of her present position and that at no time has she considered making a change.

A Straightforward Talk on Posters

By Joe Brandt*

THERE are so many different angles to the poster situation that I have decided to base my talk on two particular points that I consider most essential. One is a clean front and the other is poster-progressiveness.

In your list of grievances which were presented at one of your meetings I find the following: "Poster advertising of a high grade amusement should be at all times clean and presentable."

Your grievance committee could not have sounded the keynote of the situation better. Posters have become recognized as a tremendously vital element in the success or failure of a theater and are almost as important as the quality of your program. No matter what program you are using, either through choice or by force of circumstances, you are not getting one hundred per cent value out of your investment if you are using dirty, worn-out paper. It may cost you a few cents or a few dollars more to get up a clean front as well as an attractive one, but it will pay you bigger dividends as sure as fate.

Joe Brandt.

Let me ask you to consider the following simile: If a department store wrapped up your bundle in second-hand wrapping paper, mussed up or wrinkled from use, you would have a mighty poor opinion of the quality of goods you had bought. You never saw a bundle go out of an up-to-date department store that was not neat, attractive and classy. Did it ever occur to you that most people are sub-consciously impressed with neatness and attractiveness? It is a general law of human nature and it affects every walk of human life. First impressions are everything and there is no doubt in my mind that you lose a certain percentage of business per year by having people passing your door on account of the dirty appearance of the front, due to torn and soiled paper. The profit you lose in this way alone would have paid you the extra money it would have cost you to buy clean paper from your exchange or from the lithographing house.

I was talking with an exchange man recently on the question of mounted paper, and he agreed with me that no matter how careful his shipping department was when the paper went out, when it came back nine cases out of ten it had been so badly handled and so badly creased that when unfolded it looked like a checkerboard. It doesn't take long to put a piece of mounted paper in an awful state. Sometimes even a ten-day run customer will get a piece of paper that will be so badly bunged up that it is a disgrace to have it hanging in his lobby.

You will probably come back at me and say the exchanges are to blame for this, but during my extended trips I have found that this condition is due to the fact that the exhibitors are not willing to pay even the cost price of lithographs in order to make a decent front for their houses.

What is the use of having cracking good films and a hundred per cent program if you are going to show mussed up posters? You have received a black eye from the public before it has even entered your theater.

I can't understand, to save my life, why an exhibitor should be careless about the front of his theater. He ought to make it as attractive as he knows how. No matter what run of film he is using, he ought to insist on clean, fresh posters. Posters are always an attractive form of advertising. Every time you stick up a dirty, mussed up lithograph in front of your house, you are plainly advertising the fact that you are a careless business man. You are practically forcing an opinion on the public that your show is as your posters, and that is what hurts at the box office.

I don't believe there is an exhibitor living that doesn't, way down in his heart feel that he ought to buy the cleanest, freshest and most attractive paper that he can lay his hands on. It is more economical to pay for new paper than it is to rent paper that has been handled two or three times. Even though you may save a little money on the paper cost, are you considering the amount you are losing by the unfavorable impression you are creating?

While I am talking about clean paper, let me touch on the subject of attractiveness as well. Under this heading comes the poster that doesn't tell the truth. There was a time when the moving picture industry was in its infancy, when you could buy any old kind of a lithograph and stick it up in your lobby and humbug the public. That day is past. But once in a while you will find some film manufacturer putting out a piece of paper that is not only a disgrace to the industry but a disgrace to the community as well.

I don't really think that the manufacturer is entirely to blame for this. There's not a day passes that a publicity man don't receive at least two or three kicks from exhibitors who want highly sensational posters with plenty of gun play and red blood smeared all over them.

Take the Universal as an instance on this subject of sensational posters. We have induced the Morgan Lithograph Company to establish a separate art department for our special benefit, and there is not a drawing for a poster made that is not based on some scene actually in the film the public will see.

You probably realize that we are up against a difficult proposition where we have to satisfy everybody. The following will give you an idea of the many different phases of the poster situation:

One exchange man writes to us: "Your posters, on the whole, are excellent, but be careful not to go strong on the sensational business, as the local authorities are watching the poster situation like a hawk ready to pounce on any exhibitor who shows too much blood and thunder."

I call this particularly to the attention of the New York exhibitor; especially those who come from Buffalo. A few days ago we received the following complaint from an exhibitor: "I noticed that you are cutting out all the dead bodies from the six sheets on your war features. This is a big mistake, as it takes all realism out of the poster."

This particular complaint happened to come from Boston, and upon looking up the matter we found that a movement was on foot in Boston to establish a rigid censorship on posters. Having been notified of this movement we decided to ease up a bit so as not to stir up further agitation against sensationalism. When the matter was brought to the attention of the exhibitor he admitted that we were right and that it was the best thing to do.

I am in sympathy with the man who wants to put punch paper in front of his theater to get the money. But I think there are a great many enemies of the industry in the form of exhibitors who deliberately smear up a piece of paper in order to get a few extra dimes, not thinking of the general effect is has on the public. I am referring particularly, in this instance, to something that occurred in Denver. We

SENTENCES WITH A "PUNCH" FROM JOE BRANDT'S TALK.

Posters have become recognized as a tremendously vital element in the success or failure of a theater and are almost as important as the quality of your program.

You can't use enough posters in front of your house if you are using fresh, clean, new ones.

Go after new business as though you meant it. Advertising makes dollars grow where pennies grew before.

Every time you get something for nothing you can gamble on it that the cost is going to be taken out of something.

sent out a three-sheet that had plenty of punch in it, but the exhibitor was not satisfied; he painted in a few more dead bodies, threw some red paint on it, and made it look like a miniature slaughter house. Of course, it got the crowd, but it also got a complaint from the chief of police.

To get back to my original point, you won't need such a world of sensationalism in your posters if you will only maintain an attractive front. You will find, instead of suffering a loss, that the extra patronage you will have gained will be well worth the money invested.

Now, on the subject of poster progressiveness.

In my opinion it is the falsest kind of economy to economize on posters. You can't use enough posters in front of your house if you are using fresh, clean, new ones. If your exchange is not in a position to furnish you the quality that you want, make a deal direct with the lithograph manufacturer. There is not a film manufacturer in the business who makes a cent on paper; even if you bought a thousand posters for each release, the average film manufacturer would not be a penny richer. The lithograph companies get the profit, whatever it may be, but they are entitled to it as long as they uphold the superior quality of posters, and as long as they are giving you the best paper that money can buy. Using soiled or torn paper as your front is a gigantic mistake. It is a costly folly. Every exhibitor who is doing it is hurting himself and hurting the program he is using.

After you've got the clean poster idea in your mind open up the business throttle. If you have been using one or two six-sheets, try an experiment. Try twice the amount. If you have been buying ten or twenty and doing a little billing in your town, take a couple of more stands. In other words, branch out. Go after new business as though you meant it. Put up a few stands in some new location you have not touched before. You will be surprised at the extra patronage you will get with the small amount expended. Advertising makes dollars grow where pennies grew before. Posters are advertising. Slap them up in front of the people and make them like it; spend your own time and money putting ginger and snap and zip into your business. Be original. Go after new business from a new angle every time. Never let up. Never get into a rut. Don't be afraid to do a new thing, just because it has never been done before. You will find you are making more money by making a hundred little mistakes in experimenting than by the one big mistake of sitting back and doing nothing.

In closing I would like to touch on the point brought out by your grievance committee—that is, posters should be made part of the film service, booked as you book the reels. I have not been able to discuss the matter with your grievance committee, but if I understand the proposition correctly, your grievance committee is trying to make some kind of an arrangement whereby the posters will be included with the rental price. This is a mistake. Every time you get something for nothing, you can gamble on it that the cost is going to be taken out of something. Your grievance committee evidently has in mind the posters that are furnished by some of the feature companies. Just look over the lithograph junk that you get from the ordinary feature man and note the number of cheating and lying situations which he has in his paper that never appear in the film.

Edward L. Saunders Also Speaks

In addition to the above talk by Joe Brandt, which was delivered during the recent convention of the International Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association in New York City, the theater managers also heard from Edward L. Saunders, manager of the New York City Universal Exchange, who spoke on "The Exchange and the Exhibitor." He said in part:

One thing is very important between the exhibitor and the exchange and that is co-operation. It seems to have been overlooked by a great many exhibitors. The general run of exhibitors seem to have the idea that the exchange is going to put it over on them whenever it can. They overlook the fact that anything that is detrimental to the exhibitor is detrimental to the exchange. The real success of the exchange is measured by the success of the exhibitor; we must do the things that are in your interest if we seek our own. One of the big items in the management of an exchange is the care of the film, conserving its condition, especially in a thirty-day service. If the film comes back to the exchange in bad condition, when it left in good condition, we feel as if we had a complaint. We use every effort to keep the film in the best possible condition.

The great trouble is that many exhibitors pay no attention to their operating room. They leave everything to their operator, who may be a good man, a careful man, and he may not. He may not like the exchange, or he may not like its manager, and he may express his grudge in his treatment of the film. If every man will look out for his service the exchange can greatly improve the general result. All the matters in dispute between exhibitors can be straightened out to the satisfaction of both sides, but there must be co-operation. We must work together. You must watch your operator. Be sure that he sends back to the exchange every inch of film that he takes away. A case came under my notice recently where a boy who was carrying a film from one theater to another was selling pieces of it for a penny. We had complaints of cuts and we started out to find why there were so many on subjects just after they had been run in a certain house. Now, these cuts can't be replaced, and while this case, of course, is an unusual one, still it shows what happens at times and how the service is injured. The exchange is willing, as I said before, to co-operate with the exhibitor, because we have many interests that are common ones.

Animated Weekly Circles Globe

After months of planning and the expenditure of hundreds of dollars the Universal Film Manufacturing Company has finally completed arrangements whereby its Animated Weekly will be as up to the minute and as thorough as it is possible to make it at the present time.

Over 300 cameramen have been secured in America alone and all will contribute events from time to time while the regular cameramen will continue to secure pictures of the Mexican disturbance and of all other matters of great importance.

Jack Cohn, manager of the Animated Weekly, directs all the men in the field and also has complete charge of the editing of the films received and getting them into a one thousand foot reel each week.

A Tribute to Power's Cameragraph

The Mercantile and Financial Times, a weekly journal published in New York City and devoted to finance, insurance and mercantile interests of the United States and Canada, in its issue of June 15 contains an article regarding the Power Cameragraph, part of which is reproduced below:

One of the most important projecting machines on the market today is the Power's Cameragraph. Its construction is simple, strong and positively alive to every condition that may be presented. The name of Nicholas Power, the inventor, ranks with those of the two other great men known throughout the world for their scientific creations—Edison and Marconi—and to him belongs the credit for making possible the clear cut projection of the present day.

The factory of the Nicholas Power Company is the largest of its kind in the world and in this building about 70% of the machines used in the United States are built, while the foreign demand for them is constantly increasing. Each machine requires the fitting together of over 3,000 distinct parts, ranging from a 36-pound casting to the smallest screw. Four hundred master mechanics are employed to do the exacting work required to complete the machines.

It was Mr. Power's machine that removed the flicker from pictures; it was Mr. Power's Cameragraph that brought forth a clear-cut reproduction on the screen, and it was again his machine that supplied the detail that was missing in all other machines, and thus invention after invention finally resulted in a machine that is today recognized as the peer of all others.

New conditions are constantly arising which demand attention but Mr. Power at all times has proved himself equal to the occasion and is continually planning improvements upon his present near-perfect machine.

Forges Letter to Save Friend

"His Last Appeal"

HOW a thoughtless governor's pleasure trip almost cost an innocent man his life is told in the gripping drama the Selig Company will release on Monday, July 15, under the title of "His Last Appeal."

It is the kind of picture that will be popular with any audience, for, while it grips the heart and appeals to the higher senses, it also holds the onlooker spellbound by the suspense it works up in several of its situations. All the roles are handled in a masterful manner and in places where it would have been a simple step to overact the part the players have restrained their expressions and gestures and made them true to life. While the majority of the credit for real feeling put into this picture goes to the players at the head of the cast, even those who have but a "bit" to contribute maintain the same high standard and all are entitled to the most favorable commendation.

A tense moment in the trial.

The situation is not exactly new, but is approached from an entirely different angle from anything like it which has ever been attempted, and whereas most pictures of this type lay stress on the auto race to the governor's home with the delay caused by a tire blowing out, etc., this one does not even suggest such a feature, but rather gives us a glimpse of the terrible suffering experienced by those who are near and dear to the man awaiting execution and of the awful suspense the man himself feels.

The settings, both interior and exterior, are well selected and carefully photographed, though a little more care should have been used in eliminating the shore background from the scenes where the governor's boat is supposed to be at sea. This, however, is of minor importance and is offset by the beauty of the other settings. The court room set is simple and convincing, as are the scenes about the jail and the governor's mansion and summer home.

The story opens with the release of Clark Gordon from prison after serving a term of five years for forgery. He has determined to live straight and secures a position with a gang of men working on the city streets. His former pals learn of his release and, having a big forgery job at hand, ask him to join them. He resists the temptation, but knows they will allow him no peace until he again becomes one of them, so he decides to go away from the city.

In a distant part of the country he finds employment as bookkeeper in the office of Bell & Taylor, dealers in stocks and real estate. Bell is a shiftless fellow and leaves all the business to Taylor, who is hard working and conscientious. One day Taylor's sweetheart, Marion Mills, calls upon him and, with his introduction to her, Gordon realizes she is the one woman he could ever love, but at the same time knows that she belongs to another and that nothing but friendship can ever exist between them.

The days pass and Bell, wishing to make some side money, concocts a fake mining scheme without his partner learning of it, and persuades "Mad" Muller, a hopeless invalid whose mind is slightly affected, to buy the stocks and then proceeds to spend the profits in riotous living.

The scheme does not hold water, however, and as soon as it is discovered the newspapers play it up on the front pages. Taylor sees it and asks his partner for an explanation. Gordon is the only other person in the office at the time and rushes for the police to place the crooked Bell under arrest. The partners exchange angry words and Taylor, seeing that talk is useless, goes to his private office, leaving Bell sneering in the main room of the building.

Muller, enraged by the deception, rushes into the office and finds Bell alone. He demands satisfaction for being robbed, but Bell merely mocks him. The victim's weak mind is completely unbalanced by rage and, seizing a register of deeds stamper from the desk, he strikes the man who wronged him over the head. Bell falls to the floor and Muller flees. Taylor hears the noise and rushes from his private office. He sees the body and is horrified, but controls himself and bending over picks up the instrument of death to examine it. The police and Gordon enter and find him kneeling over the fallen body with this in his hand. Everything points to him as the murderer and he is placed under arrest, but Gordon swears to be faithful to him.

Muller, realizing the seriousness of his crime, flees in terror to the West where he hides himself in a little town. Taylor's trial is short, there being no evidence in favor of him. At his side sit his two staunch supporters, Marion and Gordon, both suffering all the anguish that the accused man is forced to undergo and attempting to console him as the verdict of guilty is received.

The date of the execution is set and, despite their continued efforts, the first opportunity Gordon and Marion have to plead with the governor for a pardon is the day before the fatal event. It is a hopeless cause, however, and they leave the executive mansion with their mission unfulfilled.

In the West, Muller's health has broken down completely and on his death bed he calls the local sheriff and confesses his crime. The sheriff immediately telegraphs to the governor and tells him of the finding of the real criminal.

The governor, however, has left for his summer home and upon arriving there immediately sets out for a trip in his motor launch. Gordon and Marion visit Taylor for the last time and the girl's sorrow makes Gordon desperate. He determines to make another appeal to the governor. Just as he arrives at the executive's office the telegram, telling of Muller's confession, is delivered and with the governor's secretary he rushes to the summer home of the official.

The governor's launch breaks down while at sea and he cannot return to shore. The clock points to two A. M., and the execution is set for five, so Gordon, unable to wait longer, becomes desperate and dashes away from the summer home to the city. He rushes to the office of Bell & Taylor and for the last time forges another person's name, that of the governor, granting a stay of Taylor's execution.

The innocent man is saved and the moment the governor returns to shore he rushes to the prison, hoping against hope that Taylor still lives. When he arrives he finds the execution postponed and is shown the letter to which his name was signed. He is surprised and declares he did not write it, and the jailor, sizing up Gordon, recognizes him as the former forger-convict. A word from the governor, however, clears Gordon and as Taylor and Marion find happiness in each other's arms the man who has blessed both their lives silently presses the girl's discarded gloves to his lips as a token of reverend, undying love.

The cast from the production is as follows:

Clark Gordon, an ex-convict.....Roy Watson
Charles Bell, a real estate broker.....William Stowell
Grant Taylor, his partner.....Barney Furey
William Chandler, the governor.....Edwin Wallock
Marion Mills.....Margaret Allen

Miss Stedman's Career

Myrtle Stedman was born in Chicago and was educated there. She studied elocution and voice culture, and, being possessed of a beautiful voice, was trained for the operatic stage. Miss Stedman made her first appearance at the age of twelve, giving a solo dance with the Whitney Opera Company in Chicago. Later the family moved to Black Hawk, Colo., where Miss Stedman's father became interested in mining, and the family still possesses a big log house in the mountains there. While in Colorado Miss Stedman used to visit the Canyon City penitentiary in order to sing to the convicts. Returning to Chicago, she again joined the Whitney Opera Company as prima donna and went on the road with them, singing in opera, comic opera and musical comedy, and later toured on the concert platform. Miss Myrtle first joined the Selig Polyscope Company, working under Otis Turner, and remained with them for four years, playing leads. She then joined Hobart Bosworth, Inc., and has since been taking leads in the Jack London stories. Jack London and Hobart Bosworth both declared that she was "just the type" for his heroines. Myrtle Stedman is fair and has a wonderfully expressive pair of blue eyes. She loves her work and attacks it earnestly. She is fond of sports and the open, and with it all is refined and ladylike.

Myrtle Stedman.

Vance Story Succeeds "Lucille Love"

Louis Joseph Vance, one of the best known modern fiction writers, has been secured to write the new serial, "Trey o' Hearts," which is to follow the present Universal serial, "Lucille Love," and which is to be released in 14 or 16 distinct parts, each 2 or 3 reels in length. The serial will commence the latter part of July, and will be exploited in a manner simliar to that used in handling its predecessor.

Through the Robyn Syndicate the story, also in serial form, will appear in 60 to 70 of the largest newspapers throughout the United States. In Europe, Australia and South America, the new Vance serial will be arranged along the same lines in conjunction with the photoplays as they are released.

Many Claimants to Uncle's Fortune

Millionaire's Character Tested

FRANCIS X. BUSHMAN has seldom been seen in a comedy role that better suited him than that of Frank Wentworth, a carefree millionaire, in Essanay's "His Stolen Fortune," to be released July 17.

The situations of the play give him a wide range for the development of his role and supported by an able cast he does some exceedingly clever work. The acting of Miss Beverly Bayne as his fiancee and Miss Helen Dunbar as her mother is also worthy of mention but the scream comes from the work of the many supernumeraries portraying characters, all of whom claim to be a certain person and who come from all walks of life with but one idea—to get the money at stake.

The photography is clear and the settings are of great merit, those in the hotel being very realistic and fitting into the story in an admirable manner. The whole production is one of great merit and reflects credit on the director. It will without a doubt prove a very popular offering with audiences of all classes as it is the variety of comedy that has an appeal to both young and old and gets over all its business without the slightest suggestion of anything which any woman or child should not see, which is more than can be said for many of the present day comedies.

The story itself was adapted from Munsey's Magazine and revolves around a rather fresh situation, that of a millionaire advertising to find the rightful owner of the fortune he believes he has secured through dishonesty. While it is principally a laugh getter it is also the kind of story that makes one think and the chuckles come from within and are not merely on the surface. While the number of people who answer the advertisement is greatly exaggerated there is no doubt a truth behind the entire production that will be sub-consciously realized by the majority of those who see it.

The opening scenes of the picture give us a glimpse of the life of Frank Wentworth, an adventure-seeking young American, whose favorite recreation is excitement and whose pet aversion is work. To him all the world is a playground and as he believes playgrounds should be used for frolic he proceeds to enjoy himself. There is one serious drawback to his pleasure, however, the lack of funds. Thus far in life he has managed in some manner or other to get through with little or no capital but suddenly he finds that money is an absolute necessity to existence.

Just about this time he receives word that an uncle, whom he had seen very little of, has passed away and that as the only surviving relative he is to receive his entire estate. Frank's joy is unbounded and from the easy-going man of the masses he becomes a society lion almost over-night. He revels in his new surroundings and is regarded by all as the "catch" of the season, but to him there is only one girl. She is Lola, a charming society belle with whom Frank falls in love immediately upon his entree into the social world.

He is supremely happy for a while and there is no obstacle in the way of his marriage to the girl of his desires until suddenly one day a bolt of lightning strikes from out of the clear sky. The attorney who informed him of his being heir to the fortune comes to him with a letter which has just been discovered among his uncle's papers saying that the entire amount of the estate was stolen and that rightfully it belongs to a poor Pole named Max Illuski and charging Frank with the responsibility of returning it to the rightful owner or his heirs.

For a moment Frank is dumbfounded but the man in him comes to the surface and he determines to do the square thing and find the wronged man. He realizes that it will end his life of ease and also knows that it will probably separate him from Lola forever but nevertheless he is firm in his determination to do what is right.

He inserts an ad in several of the papers stating the case just as it is and asking Illuski to get in touch with him at once. Lola's mother sees the ad and is very indignant to think that Frank should impose upon her daughter as she now looks upon his entire family as swindlers. The newspapers give the matter wide publicity on their front pages and the indignant mother writes Frank telling him that he can never see Lola again, although this move almost breaks the girl's heart.

Frank is very downcast and looks forward to a dead, dull life for the remainder of his days. But not so! No sooner have the newspapers been read than an army of people, all claiming the identity of the downtrodden Illuski swarm in upon him. They bloom on every street corner, spring up from apparently nowhere in his hotel and drive him into a state of panic. The worst still awaits him however as the arrival of the mail threatens to flood his room with letters, all claiming to be from the same Illuski. The adventure spirit of the young man at last receives its full and for the next twenty-four hours he is kept on a continual run, dodging "Illuskis" at every turn.

When at last he manages to escape and in exhausted condition sinks into a chair in his room the attorney who delivered the fatal message the day before manages to reach him and gives Frank another shock by telling him that the Illuski business was a farce and that he is the only person who has the slightest claim to his uncle's fortunes. The young man is completely bewildered now but begins to understand matters when the attorney explains that the uncle, who was very rigid in his demands for honesty from all he came in contact with, had made a proviso stating that if Frank did not do as the letter instructed he was to forfeit the estate.

Again the newspapers have big headlines bearing Frank's name but this time he is played up as a man with a character which is of sterling worth. Lola's mother sees the story and hastily calls up Frank to apologize but he has left his rooms. She feels that she has ruined Lola's life by barring from it a man of Frank's caliber but her fears are soon put to an end for the first place Wentworth goes for after leaving his hotel is Lola's home, for he realizes that despite her mother's objections she had loved him when he appeared to be penniless. Lola is awaiting him when he arrives and although she has not yet heard of his noble deed she shows her undying love and together they rejoice when he tells her that he still retains his fortune.

The cast of characters is as follows:

Frank Wentworth	Francis X. Bushman
Mrs. Holcombe	Helen Dunbar
Lola	Beverly Bayne
Attorney	Rapley Holmes
Hotel Clerks	Chas. Hitchcock, John Cossar

Stampede at Selig Zoo

An amusing incident happened the other day in the Selig zoo at Eastlake, Los Angeles, Cal. It is the custom to permit the younger animals to wander around a certain section known as "the big forest" practically at will, and as there are all sorts of baby animals, including elephants, camels, buffaloes, pumas, lions, leopards, tigers, giraffes, zebus, deer, and even baby crocodiles, the opportunities for "mix-ups" are frequent. On this day a brace of lion cubs while scouting through the jungle ran across one of the sacred zebu calves, being playfully inclined they proceeded to pounce upon the unsuspecting sacred with due cunning and cleverness, and while their teeth and claws were not sufficiently grown to do any damage, the calf derived a full quota of fright from the occurrence, and rushed bellowing through the reeds toward the compound where his mother was confined. The excitement communicated itself to the other youngsters, who were playing together in the jungle and there was a sudden rush for home on the part of all of them, resulting in a regular stampede, with meowings and snarlings as an accompaniment. All reached their cubby-holes in safety, however, and a general grooming of the panting and scared youngsters followed, and while the pink tongues of the lions, leopards, etc., performed the duties of brush and comb, the baby animals placed their parents between them and "the big forest," thus proving themselves disciples of "safety first."

New Universal Series

"Universal Boy" films, featuring Matty Roubert, the seven year old comedian formerly associated with the Powers brand, will be released by the Universal Company every other week commencing Thursday, July 16.

The series will treat upon persons, important or otherwise prominent in the public eye, at the same time keeping the comedy element uppermost in the development and endeavoring to make each film complete in itself.

The first picture, which has just been completed, will introduce John McGraw, famous manager of the New York Giants, and Annette Kellermann, the world famed "water venus."

By the Goat Man

EVERY little thing hinges upon the outcome of the Dayton convention. No other topic in film circles offers anything by comparison. Strong-hearted men are keyed to a frenzy. They are hopeful that the tall, blue-eyed ring-leader of the Dayton show will have lost his little book of rules and the gavel that has stirred souls to anguish. Instead of a one-man convention, exhibitors are praying for a chance to take some small part themselves. I have played the game as a prognosticator in the good old days, but I weaken here. I have seen Marcus Aurelius Neff perform. Alhell couldn't stop him. There isn't a tear in his body. He has no terrors. Neff and his own little idea that he is right have the floor and hold it against all comers. The book of rules says the floor belongs to him. The audience out front have no meaning. At least, I have seen it that way. I am going to Dayton to see the same show over again—possibly I go to my great and cheerful disappointment.

Helen Badgely on the steps of C. J. Hite's office.

Nobody in the film business knows very much about this man Neff. I have never heard his given name. You can't guess his age. There have been rumors that he was a politician of some sort before he took to motion pictures. That isn't exactly true, because politicians employ different tactics. I have tried hard to curry favor with the tall blonde from Cincinnati. He has always greeted me as "My Boy." He has always been too busy to grant me a single favor. I haven't had a line of dope about the Dayton show. It is one way of declaring his welcome to me. I can show you a great file of letters from Neff—all fervently expressing how busy he was—always too preoccupied to attend the detail of my requests. In explanation, I wish here to inject the thought that I have sung my song in the open. I have been decidedly against M. A. Neff ever since he elected himself president of the League for the third time. I unalterably oppose him as a candidate for a fourth term. They tell us he is an organizer. He has proven himself a disorganizer. Motion picture men of this country will attest this. Should they meet at Dayton, uninstructed, they will prove it.

* * *

There will be some caucuses at Dayton before the election of officers. The lobby will be active. It will be M. A. Neff's big opportunity to show the kind of stuff he is made of. I'm reasonably sure that we have been rubbing his fur the wrong way. There has been some strong motive to prompt a man to put in the better part of three years to disorganize the exhibitors of this country. There must have been a reason for imposing state censorship of films upon an exhibitor body that openly disclaims the right of it. These reasons are about as logical as the Neff-Fulton correspondence which attempted to disclose the rights of jobbers in film accessories, machine parts and the like.

* * *

We are practically all agreed that M. A. Neff's services to exhibitors have reached the parting of the ways. That is why we are going to Dayton. The exhibitors of North America have common anti-Neff beliefs.

Tell you all about it next week.

A choice bit of exclusive dope reaches me over the Dick Nehl's grapevine. Dick, besides running the American Film Manufacturing Company's plant between suns, has time to administer the affairs of the Reel Fellows on occasional off-nights and slip me a bit of this exclusive goulash at odd moments. But he is getting careless about his hair, wearing it a la North Edgewater or Edgewoods, I forget which! So I rode home for three or four weeks, a triumphal arch is to be erected and a regular entrance to the factory will be established. John Rudolph Freuler has agreed to O. K. the bill. Then there will be geraniums planted in rows to the approach leading to the garage where the Packards are kept and curfew will not ring that night. When Dick gets his new set of blue prints ready, I get the tracing cloth. But I'm going to go back there again for a Flying-A customer's brand—lower left hand drawer of the Nehl's desk.

Pop Lubin's fire loss cannot be measured in dollars and cents. D'Arcy is vindicated. For the story goes that among the films that were destroyed was one dear old "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in which Siegmund Lubin took the title role of Simon Legree. Thus Pop Lubin's tears. That was worse, much worse, than having to get a pass from the guard before he could enter his own premises at Betzwood estate.

My dear Bodine, I have those Agfa samples and my little statuette of Bunny has a sore neck trying to see the tops of the spires alongside. Great little show staged on the top of my roll-top. What is more I keep snipping off samples for people who might be interested in the one full of titles.

I'm making a book that C. Lang Cobb scores in this number. When it is quiet all around the office I always figure that Cobb is lurking around somewhere. There is one chance in my favor. When I saw Cobb in New York, he was wearing a white suit, white shoes and a pink shirt—one of those soft, silky creations I have seen in shop windows. He was seated at his desk. There may have been some bells on him, for all I know, but gee-min-ee, he looked mighty cool and comfy.

That's the dickens of it. When I mention one of the Cobbs—no matter which one—I always think of the other one. Mrs. Agnes Egan Cobb was dolled-up a bit herself N. Y. convention week and as per usual she was as gracious as her toggery! It was Mrs. Cobb herself who ushered me all about the new Eclair general offices in the Leavitt Building—all done in golden oak with new furnishings and modern conveniences de luxe. Away off in the remote corner I met and told Eclair's director general (that title came all the way across from Paree) what I knew about my own game and how little I knew about his. I would put this estimable and courteous gentleman's name down here if I thought it would do any good, but it wouldn't. To us Americans, a Frenchman's name never spells what we are prone to pronounce it and we simply can't furnish the code. At any rate Eclair's director general will make his name known way beyond the confines of the Leavitt Building and he won't be long in doing it. One slant at the way he has his organization working—the manner he has planned for their comfort—told me that something would come out of the place for the careful consideration of a lot of us exhibitors. Eclair is one of the great film organizations of several continents, standing high in the front ranks with its productions. With the help of Mrs. Cobb I'll hope to give you a close-up still of her business chief before many succeeding weeks.

This thing of slashing the suds around a lot of cuts that Caward doesn't know where to plant is becoming a habit with me. Now that my assignment comes every week, I fear that I'll weary most of the friends who have stood for this stuff bi-weekly. Making a weekly is some regular grind. It is something akin to the film business itself, but with the difference that the film game may threaten changed policies over night while the publisher must go right along like a limited train with its air-system on the bum. The weekly is fifty-two times a year. Think what it must mean to the film maker with his three to fourteen reels a week. Our own troubles are little ones after all.

I can't quite gather what the yowl is all about, now that the New York show is in disfavor with some of the alleged m. p. journals of that town. This isn't a theatrical enterprise that engages us exhibitors, nor was the New York exposition a rendezvous for the actors of the legitimate stage. Smatter, boys, didn't you get all the passes you wanted? Why the lint? I used my badge for just my lonesome—it was all I needed. I'm satisfied.

To Re-Issue Pickford Films

The Universal Film Company has decided to reissue several of the films in which Miss Mary Pickford, the celebrated screen star, appeared while working with the old Imp company. These plays were produced three or four years ago and enjoyed immense popularity at that time and many exhibitors and fans who remembered them have at various times requested that they again be released.

The first of the series will make its appearance on July 20 under the title of "In the Sultan's Garden" and will be followed by others every other Monday for an indefinite period. Owen Moore and Victor Star will appear opposite Miss Pickford in these pictures, all of which will be released under the Imp brand.

Olcott Leads Company to Ireland

Following a most enjoyable trip across the ocean on the Adriatic, Sidney Olcott and a company of players have arrived in England where they will remain a short time before proceeding to Ireland to film several feature pictures about the Lakes of Killarney.

The trip across the water was highly successful, Mr. Olcott being acquainted with the officers of the Adriatic and receiving their hearty co-operation. The passengers also assisted the company by appearing in several scenes of a picture, in which Mr. Olcott and Miss Grant played the leads.

The company was honored by being seated at the purser's table during the trip, the only other passenger at this table being Lord Trimblestown, an Irish nobleman who invited the players to use his estate while producing in Ireland.

Film Folks Enjoy River Trip

The yacht Scanti flying the colors of the Columbia Yacht Club and commanded by Capt. Manson left the Club House Wednesday afternoon, June 17, with a party representing numerous motion picture interests, both foreign and domestic, for a sail up the river. After partaking of luncheon, the party enjoyed being photographed in action by H. Maire, technical manager of the Eclair Film Company, and also numerous still photographs were taken for a beautiful pamphlet to be devoted to the exploitation of Mr. Potter's plays by the Ramo Company. After a delightful sail, Nyack Bay was reached where dinner was served. The return trip was one of continual merriment. Many beautiful scenes were taken of the Palisades and other interesting points along the river. The party was given in honor of Paul M. Potter, the celebrated dramatist who recently contracted with Ramo Films, Inc., for twenty-four of his best plays for motion picture adaptation and production.

The owner of the yacht Scanti is William Waite Snow, treasurer of Ramo Films, Inc. She is a beautiful boat measuring 70 feet long and a twin screw.

The party consisted of Paul M. Potter, Homer H. Snow and wife, C. Lang Cobb, Jr., manager sales and publicity Ramo Films, Inc.; Agnes Egan Cobb, manager of the Leading Players Film Corp., Miss Josephine Cobb, Claude Patin, secretary general of Eclair Film Company, J. Stanley Walpole Versatile Player

A finely built and manly looking leading man, whose portrayals in recent productions offered by the Eclair Company have attracted much favorable comment and attention, answers to the name of Stanley Walpole and proudly claims Australia as the land of his birth, although he has become a staunch and arden American in his ideas and mannerisms.

Mr. Walpole first heard the applause of the multitude with the late Wilson Barrett, famous English actor and manager, with whom he played for twelve months in London and the provinces. After a road tour which ended somewhat disastrously, the young Australian with theatrical aspirations secure engagement with Jenny Maynard, the well known comedienne and played in two comedies entitled "Nurse" and "Jim Belmont." Then followed a season with the "melodrama king" of Australia, Bland Hope, and Mr. Walpole gave a finished juvenile performance in such thrillers as "The Great Ruby," "At the Old Bridge," "The Last Shot" and many others too numerous to mention. Tiring of life on the road, with its many inconveniences, the Australian performer who had by this time acquired quite a reputation, was engaged by the late J. C. Williamson to support well known Australian and English stars in stock, with which organization Mr. Walpole remained for six years.

Two years ago the versatile Australian came to America on a pleasure trip and while here was introduced to one of the leading "movie" producers. Sizing up his personal qualifications, this gentleman seized upon Mr. Walpole as a type and after a short engagement with the Reliance Company, Walpole signed a contract with the Eclair Film Company.

AT DAYTON.

THE complete program of the annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America at Dayton, Ohio, July 6 to 11, we printed last week. It makes an interesting schedule, and one guaranteed to keep the visitors pleasantly busy for a whole week.

Some, no doubt many, will be present who also attended the New York convention last month. They will find that the smaller city has some real advantages over the big one when they want to work; for the distractions are fewer and the entertainment features less strenuous. That, however, may or may not be an attraction. One of the disadvantages of the smaller city is the tendency of hotels to take advantage of the unusual influx of visitors by boosting rates and cutting service. We trust this will not be the case at Dayton this year. The visiting exhibitors will have an opportunity to inspect the plant of the National Cash Register Company, as that trip is on the program; and as it is an education in itself, it should not be missed.

Two special features of the Exposition, held in conjunction with the convention, while not specially important are interesting. The first is the closing of the exposition to the general public during the morning hours. Inasmuch as the purpose of the event is to give manufacturers and dealers an opportunity to display their wares before their prospective buyers, who are the visiting exhibitors, this arrangement is good. And as the public is admitted after 1:30 p. m. there can be no complaint on that score. Before that hour the trade will be able to enjoy uncrowded aisles and booths, and meet each other in a calm and unhurried state of mind.

The other feature is the offering of prizes to the visiting exhibitors who buy the largest bills of goods at the exposition booths. This is a modification of the trading stamp idea. The only economic objection to it is the element of chance in it. It favors the dealer at the expense of the buyer by encouraging overbuying without guaranteeing any advantage. The cash prize is really a special discount, which always warrants a heavy purchase. But only the few biggest buyers get the discount; it is not prorated among all of them. We do not wholly approve the scheme; but whether it pleases or displeases depends largely on the temperament of the buyers.

It is understood that a special delegation from the International Motion Picture Association will visit the convention in the interests of amalgamation of the two bodies. We hope this very important subject will receive the serious consideration of the convention, and that definite steps will be taken toward that "consummation devoutly to be wished" by all exhibitors, and indeed by all the trade, a single association. We cannot conceive of any other topic so momentous as that.

AN EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM.

AN educational motion picture program was always a favorite topic with the trade press. It mattered not that there was not and never had been such a program run by any exhibitor; the press insisted that there ought to be, and that the too-wise exhibitor who denied it was overlooking the one best bet.

In return the exhibitor accused the press of "highbrowism," declared he knew what the people wanted, and so stuck to his comedies and dramas. And so persistent was he in this attitude that even the puny, inadequate supply of educationals that did exist dwindled; or, rather, the dramatic releases increased in number and glory at a pace which soon

Now in all this time the educational subject, to say nothing of the educational program, has never really had a fair show. Very few programs ever contained more than half a reel of educational stuff; and very likely some of the people who were attracted in by the other two and a half or more reels didn't care for the high-brow half-reel. Five or six of them probably got up and walked out when it appeared. Then the exhibitor felt himself vindicated, and told the exchange to cut out the school-master stuff. So the appetite for educationals went unappeased. In the heart of the film circle you might have thought the subject forgotten.

Then suddenly comes an announcement that an arrangement has been made with the Strand Theater, New York City, by the Eclair Film Company, to show that company's "Scientia" brand of films—a purely educational series, as the name indicates. The list of subjects embraces practically everything that could properly be classified as educational: Scenics and travel films, geographical instruction, natural history, scientific demonstrations, and so on. Four of these subjects are being turned out each week, and some six hundred have already been made. The first showing of two of them at the Strand was exceedingly well received.

The supply of this brand, as announced, is adequate for a thorough trial of the experiment—for we presume exhibitors will still insist on calling it an experiment until the public has proved conclusively that it wants educational stuff. So far as we are concerned, we have no doubt in the matter at all. We know the Strand's new feature will draw well, and from a section of the public that has heretofore been little impressed with the films. And we know the producer of these educational subjects will never regret the time and money spent on them.

LOCAL CRITICISM.

A PECULIARITY of the kind of human nature exemplified in municipal government and those societies and associations which work for civic and social uplift, is its unwillingness to take anybody else's word for anything or to learn by the experience of others. The fact that the National Board of Censorship, with all its remarkable record, is not accepted as authority in many places, is a case in point.

The Board has just issued what it calls "The Solution of the National Board for the Local Criticism of Motion Pictures." It is so well worth consideration that we quote here as much of it as we have space for. After emphasizing the point that the Board examines ninety-five per cent of all films, the only exceptions being some of the "states' rights" features, and expressing the firm conviction that "no fair and representative censorship of pictures can be carried on under legal restrictions by the national government and by the authorities of the states for large and diverse city populations," these suggestions are made:

Except in unusual instances, some form of public criticism is better than police censorship. The outstanding cities of the country which have attempted the regulation of pictures through the police or licensing authorities are Boston, Providence, New Haven, Baltimore, Pittsburg, Detroit, Minneapolis and Chicago. With the exception of the last named, there has been from the beginning, cordial co-operation with the National Board. At present in the case of Chicago there is a large degree of harmony and an exchange of information. Chicago is also changing its method of obtaining, through civil service examination, ten censors who shall handle the details of motion picture criticism.

The National Board believes that it is important to concentrate the attention of representatives of the executive power in each city, the mayor, on those pictures in which there is the maximum moral danger to the citizens of the city. These include the states rights pictures which have a fugitive existence and have not been passed by the Board; those which have been condemned; those which have been passed with certain eliminations, and those others which, though they have been passed by the Board, are unsatisfactory to complaining citizens.

The plan now in use in Milwaukee was worked out after conferences with a representative of the National Board. It is as follows:

The mayor appoints a commission for the purpose of advising him in regard to the exhibition of motion pictures. The method of procedure will be that the commission will notify all motion picture theater owners and managers that only pictures censored by an accredited or approved censorship board must be shown. If necessary, special pictures should be exhibited to the commission before they are shown. Unless this is done, action will be taken against the license of the offender. The commission is composed of seven persons, two representatives satisfactory to the motion picture men, one member of the extension division of the state university, one member of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association, one member of the city group and two persons connected with some other association. In Kansas City, after discussion with the National Board, the criticism of pictures was turned over to the Board of Public Welfare with authority to compel obedience. The weekly bulletins of the National Board are followed carefully. Pictures which have not come before the Board are all viewed. The pictures rejected and in which there are eliminations on the bulletin of the National Board are watched and pictures are also criticized on complaint of the interested public. The plan seems to be fair and satisfactory to all concerned. In Portland, Oregon, Nashville, Jackson, Ft. Worth, Houston, Dallas, Orange, Camden, Omaha, Los Angeles and other cities this plan has been followed.

The National Board in its own home city of New York has worked out a similar plan with the necessary modifications with the Department of Licenses. The details are as follows:

Through co-operation between the National Board and the Department of Licenses, attention is concentrated upon those pictures in which there is moral danger for New York.

Arrangements are made by which complaints are received from various sources. These are sifted by the National Board and reports both on the details and the moral value of the picture are placed in the hands of the commissioner. Attention is concentrated upon exhibitors who persistently offend in the use of indecent and immoral films.

A committee of seven skilled citizens are appointed by the commissioner of licenses, upon recommendation by the National Board, to view pictures upon which there is complaint and presumptive need of action. They recommend to the commissioner the action to be taken on the film in question. After viewing it, either in the theater or in the office of the owner, and finding it objectionable, the exhibitors of the city are warned not to put this picture on in any house under penalty of action for which the department is already authorized.

Experience has shown in most of the cities where the plan above mentioned has been in effect that one hundred per cent of efficiency is attained. The cry for state and federal censorship under this co-operation between the National Board and citizens' groups loses all its point. The absurd charges for the censorship of all reels becomes unnecessary. The work on the state and federal censorship commissions is a duplication and the industry as a whole takes its place with those others which are ministering to the amusement, instruction and the inspiration of people.

To put the whole matter into a sentence, the National Board is capable of solving the entire censorship problem for this country. The only obstacle to its doing so forthwith is the unfortunate trait of civic human nature mentioned in our opening paragraph. The exhibitors of each city should take the matter in hand and try to persuade their local governments that co-operation with the Board would save both the city and the industry much trouble, expense and annoyance, and assure a satisfactory condition in the theaters.

CRANE WILBUR has been in motion pictures but one year, and that with Pathe, but has accumulated more popularity, publicity, and universal appreciation of his work than the nine years he spent on the stage ever began to bring him. Mr. Wilbur's knowledge of the stage is not by any means confined to the footlights. He is an author and a playwright and has launched several plays and vaudeville sketches with great success. His first appearance on the dramatic stage was with Henry Irving in "Robespierre" in London. His particular stunt consisted in leading a mule and cart across the stage in which were seated Mr. Irving and Ellen Terry, and reading his one line which was "Yes," and which he laughingly claims he forgot. Some of Mr. Wilbur's most valuable training was received while with Mrs. Fiske's famous Manhattan Company.

CLIFFORD BRUCE'S perfect composure and self-control before the Pathe camera was attained through years of success on the legitimate stage. He was leading man with Charles Frohman for four years; played Kyrle Bellew's part in "The Thief" with a special company; spent two years as leading man with William Gillette on his farewell tour; and was featured at the Alcazar Theater with Nance O'Neill. In addition to this invaluable road experience he played the lead in stock companies in Washington, Baltimore, and the Manhattan Opera House in New York. Like many other well known actors Mr. Bruce recognized the unusual opportunities and the unlimited field for dramatic ability offered by motion pictures and which the speaking stage can never hope to equal. He grasped the first chance to enter the film game and his work is now watched with interest by a vast army of picture fans.

PEARL WHITE recalls, without the least sign of embarrassment or blushes but rather with many laughs, the days when she used to run about the dusty streets of her home town in Missouri, a little red-headed, freckle-faced girl with a family of broken down dollies under her arm. Nobody knew her then but her parents and the neighbors. Now—well that's different—the mere mention of the name of Pearl White suggests the Pathe players and the heroine role of "The Perils of Pauline" series. Of all the characters she has portrayed during her two years at the Jersey City studio her favorite is the one in which she is now working, Pauline. It is an exciting and often a dangerous one, but that accounts for much of its charm. All the assurance Miss White needs is that the realism will make a good picture and the dangers are discounted at once.

SAM J. RYAN is the genuine fun-maker of the Pathe studio, both because of his good-natured disposition and because he has followed that profession all his life. As a talented comedian he stands in the front row of the Irish humorists of today. Previous to his connection with the Pathe people Mr. Ryan was a member of the comedy team of Lewis & Ryan, the fact alone that George M. Cohan signed them for a six years' engagement speaking for their popularity. Mr. Ryan's greatest achievement was in the role of John Fagen in that wonderful musical comedy, "The Yankee Prince," which played to hundreds of thousands on Broadway and later toured the United States and abroad. Though his forte is undoubtedly comedy, Mr. Ryan's versatility in portrayal is seen in his playing the "heavy" as a political boss in the late dramatic release, "The Stain."

A Popular Lubinite

Joseph Kaufman is a fair example of the quality of players now demanded by the Lubin Company. Amateurs are treated as amateurs and given their chance, but for responsible parts the people must be actors of experience, and Kaufman is eminently fit. Born in Washington, D. C., in 1882, he was educated at the Georgetown University and graduated with honors. With a forceful temperament and strong personality he adopted the stage at an early age, first playing for five years in a famous stock company. This was his apprenticeship, in which he had the advantage of playing over two hundred roles. With this experience he was well fitted for Broadway and engaged by Charles Frohman for the Empire stock company, in those days the greatest company America had ever seen. Among the stars that he supported were Maude Adams, Marie Doro, Mrs. Patrick Campbell, Fay Davis, Ethel Barrymore, William Collier and Elsie Janis. For a while he was a favorite player in Henry Savage's companies, and later with Cohan and Harris, always playing leading roles. While not really starring Frederick Thompson featured Kaufman in "Via Wireless" and as Monte Brewster in "Brewster's Millions." Much more could be told of his stage career which has made him a valuable player in the Lubin studio of Philadelphia and a man much respected and liked by his associates.

Has Three Dramas Ready

The recently incorporated $500,000 U. S. Amusement Company, of which Herbert Blaché, of Blaché Features, is the president, has already completed three dramas, all of which are in eight reels. Another drama of six reels is also ready for the screen, while still another is in an advanced stage of production.

James J. Corbett in "The Burglar and the Lady," produced by the new company, is in eight reels, as is also "The Sins of Satan," and a third photodrama, the title of which is being jealously guarded at the present writing. The six reel drama is a screen adaptation of Dickens' "The Chimes," by Mr. Blaché, produced in collaboration with Tom Terriss. An exceptionally strong cast, which includes "The Charles Dickens' Associate Players," was used in this production, and the Dickens' atmosphere is said to be remarkably true to that of his famous works. A number of plays familiar to theater patrons have been whipped into scenario form for production in the near future and most of them are in eight reels.

The presenting of Solax and Blaché features has not been interrupted by the activities of the new company.

$1,000,000 Mystery Continues

THE third installment of the great Thanhouser serial, "The Million Dollar Mystery," begins at the point where the second ended, showing Countess Olga still in the confidence of Florence Gray and endeavoring to discover the whereabouts of the missing millionaire, in order that the conspirators may wreak vengeance upon him. All her craft fails, however, to elicit information from the girl, since Florence knows no more of her father's whereabouts than does Olga.

The photographic excellence of the production still continues in the third installment and one big set follows another in rapid succession, the deepest one probably being that which depicts the annual Charity Ball at which both Braine, the leader of the Black Hundred, and Countess Olga are guests. Especially good are the scenes on the dock, when one considers the bad light conditions under which the cameraman had to work. The "punch" in the third section of the story comes at the end of the second reel, when we see the conspirators attacked by the police, who have been summoned by Norton, the reporter, and attempting to escape from the clutches of the law by various methods. Braine, the leader of the gang, does a headlong plunge off the end of the dock just as the picture ends, thus eluding the officers who have been persistently following him.

The film begins in the Hargreaves home, where Florence in still in conference with Countess Olga, who has convinced her that she is an old friend of her father's. Norton, the reporter, is inclined to be suspicious of the countess, but keeps his thoughts to himself, and watches Olga leave the house after having failed to learn anything of importance from Florence.

Norton hastens to the captain and warns him against the conspirators.

The ship which had picked up Hargreaves and the aeronaut far out at sea, when the balloon in which they were escaping came down in mid-ocean, docks in New York and the millionaire and his friend elude the dock crowd and vanish in the great city, though the city papers discover that they had been passengers on the vessel and publish accounts of the sensational rescue.

Braine and Olga, reading in the papers that Hargreaves has landed without their knowledge, are much chagrined, but determine to discover his hiding place. Olga, representing herself as Hargreave's daughter, goes to the captain of the ship to see if she cannot pick up some information of value, but Norton, the reporter friend of Florence's, has previously seen the captain and arranged with him that anyone inquiring for Hargreaves is to be told he left a package in the safe of the steamship company immediately upon landing. Norton believes that in this way he can obtain a clue as to the identity of the conspirators who are pursuing the millionaire.

Accordingly the captain tells Olga that the package is in a big safe in the dock office, and the Russian countess hastens to interview the man in charge of the office, but here, too, Norton has outwitted her by arranging to have the man tell her she must properly identify herself before he can turn anything over to her. Foiled, the countess sets out to find Braine and to plan a way of obtaining whatever papers Hargreaves may have left in the safe.

Learning of Olga's visit to the captain and the dock office, Norton feels sure that the conspirators will try to crack the safe that night in order to obtain the papers, and that by being on hand with a squad of police he can capture the whole gang red-handed. He lays his plans accordingly, visiting Florence in the meantime and telling her that the gang who are hounding her father will be captured that night.

Olga, meanwhile, has difficulty in finding Braine, but finally learns that he had gone to the Charity Ball, and follows him there. Explaining what she has learned of the mysterious package or paper in the dock safe, Olga plans with Braine to secure the papers that very night. Braine leaves the ball hurriedly and goes to a low saloon where he engages a gang of toughs to assist him in his plans at the dock.

At the appointed hour Braine and his gang appear on the dock and begin their task of breaking into the building. While at this job they are interrupted by the night watchman, but manage to overpower him and lock him up in a distant part of the building. Then they leisurely proceed to break into the office and finally to attack the safe in which Braine believes the papers are concealed.

Norton, meanwhile, is watching operations from a vantage point within the building and shortly after the conspirators have blown open the safe and are examining their loot he shows himself in the doorway. Braine and his gang, realizing that they are liable to be attacked by the police at any moment, flee in all directions, but Norton fires his revolver in the air as a signal, and from behind boxes, barrels and crates in all parts of the big warehouse come squads of police. With drawn clubs they charge the gangsters, who are frightened and running in every direction.

Braine, more lucky than the rest, finds his way safely to a window opening out upon the dock, and plunges through to escape in the shadows. He has been seen, however, by two husky coppers, who at once start in pursuit. Down the full length of the warehouse and out upon the piling at the extreme end of the dock Braine dashes in his effort to escape. Realizing that he is cornered and will soon be captured, Braine desperately plunges into the sea, his dive from the dock being most spectacular.

Norton surprises the gang in the act of cracking the safe.

Just as the film ends we behold Norton and the squad of police, at the other end of the dock, driving the gang of toughs into a corner and overpowering them one at a time. The leader, however, has escaped and seems to be once more at large and able to continue his efforts to locate Hargreaves, the missing millionaire. Another week will have to elapse before the public can resume the story in part four of the serial. Part three will be released on Monday, July 6.

Is Danger Fascinating?

Why is it that the actress enjoys that element of danger that is so often necessary in the production of a picture? The question was recently asked Vivian Rich, the leading lady of Sydney Ayres' company of the American films. "Now," said Miss Rich, with a puzzled look, "I just cannot explain. I must admit, when the director tells me it is necessary to do such and such a thing, to perform some act where there is an element of danger, that for the moment I am frightened, because I realize that a mis-step, a moment of hesitation may result in injury. Yet the minute I am in action, I forget the danger that surrounds me, the mere fact that there is danger is in itself a fascination.

"In the production 'Nature's Touch' I dress as a boy and creep under a freight train and ride 'the bumpers.' I must truthfully admit that when I reached the location and saw where I had to lie down, when I saw those mighty wheels, when I realized that if I rolled off my little perch I would be ground to pieces, a certain fear possessed me. No, I was not nervous, but that uncertainty filled me with dread. Yet strange to say the minute I was in position and the train moved off I forgot the danger and really enjoyed the novelty of the situation. The train gained momentum, the wheels turned faster and faster, the ground beneath me flew by like a white streak, the dust encircled me, but I enjoyed it. There was something thrilling in the whole experience. I had lost all fear, I enjoyed my ride and really felt sorry when the train, a half-mile further on, came to a stop.

Home Triumphs Over Career

Strong Circus Picture

ONE of the best pictures manufactured by the American Film Company for several months is "The Call of the Sawdust," which is to be released on July 13. It is a circus story, dealing with the dramatic side of life under the great white tents, and to merely say the atmosphere is true to life hardly does it justice, as it lifts one bodily out of his surroundings and places him in the midst of the bustle and excitement connected with the arrival of the circus troupe in a small town, the raising of the tents, the parade and the performance itself. There have been other circus pictures made, but it is doubtful if any of them gave more realistic a portrayal of actual circus life than this one does.

Director Thomas Ricketts deserves great credit for this splendid setting, but he has not been satisfied to simply rest on the securing of a perfect background, but has blended the story into it so cleverly that at all times it appears perfectly natural and is not burdened with the "stagey" appearance that often results when players attempt to associate with people in other walks of life in making a picture.

The perfect unison of the things mentioned above, coupled with the splendid acting of Misses Greenwood and Burton and Messrs. Coxen and Fields, and the well known clear cut photography for which this company is noted make the picture look like a winner.

Although the majority of the scenes deal with the sawdust arena there are also many human interest views of quiet farm life, and at one point a glimpse of a family gathered about an old fashioned fireplace stands out as a masterpiece of rural coloring. The contrast of these quiet scenes to the bustle of circus life is felt strongly and will probably remain impressed upon the spectators' memory for some time after the plot has been forgotten. The story itself is of the quiet variety and appeals to the heart rather than attempting to introduce any sensational scene to thrill the audiences.

It opens with the arrival of a circus troupe in a small town. We are shown the spreading of the canvas, the unloading of material, the raising of the tents and the forming of the parade. The curious crowd watching the men at work preparing for the performance, and totally unconscious of the camera, gives the film a life-like appearance that could never result had it been "faked."

With the circus is Annette, who at the beginning of the tour had been chosen as leading rider of the bareback performers and who had unconsciously won the admiration of Henri Dupree, the ringmaster. Marie, another rider who loves Henri, is made insanely jealous of Annette because of the attentions she receives, and determines to injure her at the first opportunity.

William Ward, a young farmer, together with his mother, father and sister, rides into town the morning of the performance to witness the parade, and while strolling about the grounds sees Annette trip over a coil of ropes and fall. He assists her to her feet and escorts her to her dressing tent. It is a case of love at first sight between them, and that afternoon finds Ward in the main tent eagerly waiting for Annette to appear.

Just before the performance Marie sees a chance to injure Annette, as the hoops she uses in her act are left in the jealous girl's dressing room. Marie stretches wires across the hoops and pastes paper over them so they are not visible, and as Annette attempts to jump through them she is hurled to the ground.

Ward sees the accident and rushes to Annette's side. She is taken to a hospital, where it is discovered that her hip is injured and that she will not be able to ride again for many months. Immediately Henri's interest in her dies, as he sees she cannot continue as a star performer, and when the troupe leaves the next day she says goodbye to all her former associates.

The Ward family gathers around the fireplace.

The time drags slowly on and all that lightens Annette's burden is Ward's frequent visits. Slowly the spark that was kindled at their first meeting grows and they realize they love each other. Mrs. Ward takes Annette into her home as soon as she is able to leave the hospital and it is not long before she gives up all thoughts of her old life and marries Ward.

A year passes and at its end we find Annette the happy mother of a baby boy and Ward more devoted to her and their son than ever. She has all that a woman can desire, but her heart still craves for the excitement of the old life and the applause of the crowds. One day her husband finds her dressed in her old riding costume and fears she is not content. She sees his sorrow at her actions and again determines to put all thoughts of her former life out of her mind, and though it is a hard struggle she conquers herself.

Then one day the circus again comes to town, and Annette, who is shopping with her husband, sees that it is the troupe she formerly was with. Her old friends meet and recognize her, and Henri, who is with them, sees she is even more beautiful now than she was when she was his star performer. He pleads with her to return to the troupe, but she steadfastly refuses.

Finally, however, the desire to again become a public favorite gets the best of her and she agrees to ride just once more, at the performance that evening. Her husband sees her with her former associates and fears she is to return to them, but she quiets his doubts and they return home.

That night she takes her costume and slips away to the big tents to answer the call of the sawdust, leaving a note for Ward saying she wishes to ride just once more. Her appearance is a grand success, the great crowd which has gathered applauding her loudly. Flushed with adventure she hurries to her dressing room, where Henri awaits her with words of praise. He tells her of the future that awaits her if she will come with them, and for a moment Annette is tempted. Then she thinks of her little baby who needs her attention and of her faithful husband who awaits her and she conquers her longings for the last time and hurries homeward.

In their little living room she finds Ward, his head bowed in sorrow. He has found her note and believes that she has left him forever to again join the circus troupe. She gathers their little son into her arms and kneels at his side, satisfied that happiness can be found only in the home and that the cheers of the multitudes can never be compared to the devotion of a loving husband. And Ward, seeing the woman he loves has come back to him, gladly forgives her.

Annette, a circus rider.....Winnifred Greenwood
William Ward, a farmer.....Edward Coxen
Henri Dupree, circus ringmaster.....George Field
Marie, a circus rider.....Charlotte Burton
Mr. Ward, William's father.....John Steppling
Mrs. Ward, William's mother.....Ida Lewis
Nellie, their daughter.....Edith Borella

"Satan's Rhapsody" Unique Kleine Film

"Satan's Rhapsody" is the unique title of a new, splendid and costly film soon to be released by George Kleine. The story features the famous actress, Lyda Borelli, whose sensational work in "The Naked Truth," now playing at the Candler Theater, New York, proves a revelation to picture fans.

Versatile Miss Billington

Francelia Billington, who plays leads in the Reliance films, has attained considerable versatility in her nineteen years. In addition to her ability to portray comedy as well as emotional roles she can take her place at the camera, focus it and turn the crank with the skill and precision of an old operator. Her interest in photography, which takes up most of her spare time and considerable of her money, was responsible for her learning to operate a motion picture camera. She not only handles the camera, but she has a darkroom in her home where she develops her negatives and makes her own prints. It was a natural step from the still camera to the motion picture machine. Miss Billington began her career as a movie actress as the result of a joke. She appeared in minor roles with a small concern in California where she chanced to be seen by a representative of the Thanhouser Company who caused her to be engaged. After a stay with the Thanhouser she was transferred to the Majestic and later to the Reliance. Nature was kind to Miss Billington and she was apparently intended to play romantic roles. She is tall and lithe and her personal charms have caused her to be known as "The Beauty of the Screen." If the silent drama ever loses her it will be because she decides to use her fine soprano voice. Her mother is one of the leading musicians in Los Angeles and the daughter has been trained in music by her mother.

World Famous Tragedy Told in Film

Kleine Releasing "Othello"

The general's wife arrives at Cyprus.

ANYONE who seriously doubts the wonderful broadening and educational value of the films should view the five reel production of "Othello," to be released by George Kleine through the General Film Company, on July 6. Here we behold the great Shakespearean tragedy, acted by players of world-wide renown, filmed amid the actual environment of the story, and staged with a total disregard of expense. People who never have had the privilege of seeing a Shakespearean production, probably thousands who never even heard of Shakespeare, will be able to enjoy on the picture screen the great and powerful story of the Moor and his Venetian bride. One of the works, at least, of the world's greatest poet will accordingly be brought to the masses at a price within their reach and in a fashion which fully equals any stage production of the same drama that has ever been attempted on the legitimate stage.

Iago involves Cassio in a street brawl.

For those who have been privileged to see some of the eminent Shakespearean stars in the role of the Moor, the film will offer an additional treat by supplying real canals of Venice in place of gaudy, painted backgrounds, real castles in place of make-believe structures, and real sunlight on players, glittering armor and quaint old balconies, in place of the calcium's glare, which was the best substitute the legitimate stage had to offer. Instead of a wabbly, cheaply painted, papier mache ship, in which the Othello of the stage was accustomed to set forth to war, we are shown a whole fleet of ancient craft, filled to overflowing with a host of soldiery, sailing majestically across a real harbor; instead of a cheap imitation of the doge's palace, built of pine and canvas, we are shown close-up views of the time scarred building in which the rulers of Venice used to hold their council meetings; and in place of the pitifully inadequate representation of the naval battle between the troops lead by Othello and the Turkish fleet, we are given a real struggle, between real ships, on a real bay, and behold at the finish the complete destruction of the Turkish vessels. In every respect the picture surpasses the stage version of the same drama and words alone are lacking to make the production perfect.

The player enacting the role of Iago is a master mummer and ranks but little, if any, below the man who plays Othello. The other principals in the world-famous tragedy are all well chosen and make the most of every scene and every situation. The photography throughout is clear cut and sharp, and the canal and garden scenes are beautiful in the extreme. At this point it might be mentioned that when this portion of the film was being made the city of Venice declared a half holiday and all traffic on the Grand Canal was halted for several hours, leaving only the ancient palaces, the gayly costumed players and the clicking cameras of the Photo-Drama company.

The story of Othello is so well known that it seems unnecessary to repeat it here, but for those who may have forgotten their Shakespeare it may be briefly summarized as follows:

Othello, a Moorish general, whose dusky skin cannot conceal his chivalrous and adventurous spirit, is entertained by Brabantio, a Venitian noble. Desdemona, the beautiful daughter of Brabantio, is so fascinated by the tales of war and adventure which Othello relates that she seeks his company day after day to listen to further accounts of his experiences, and eventually falls in love with him, despite the blackness of his skin.

Suddenly Othello finds his warlike qualities in demand, for he is in the service of the Venetian government and the state now requires his presence in Cyprus to oppose a Turkish fleet. After telling the fair Desdemona of the necessity for his presence in Cyprus, the lovers consult together and eventually decide to wed without delay, thus making it possible for Desdemona to follow her lord into the field once he shall have established himself in the Venetian camp. Meanwhile Iago, Othello's bosom friend and ensign, has sworn secret enmity against the Moor, because Cassia and not himself has been raised to the chief lieutenacy. The crafty Iago devotes every moment of his time to working out plan after plan for revenging himself upon Othello. Learning that Desdemona has eloped with Othello, Iago hastens to inform Roderigo, a former suitor of Desdemona's and to urge him to advise Brabantio, the girl's father, of what has happened. Brabantio is much angered at Roderigo's tale, for he imagines that Othello has kidnapped his daughter, not believing for a moment that the girl can be in love with a Moor.

Brabantio, with his escort, sets out to find Othello and encounters him in the palace of the doges, where he has been summoned to receive final instructions before setting forth to war. Confronted with Roderigo's story, the dusky Moor hastens to assert that Desdemona became his bride voluntarily, and as proof of this version of the affair he asks Brabantio to hear the girl herself. Much to her father's chagrin, Desdemona publicly acknowledges her love for Othello and so the Moor goes forth with his fleet, leaving Desdemona behind with Iago, comforted with the promise that she shall come to his camp as soon as it is safely established on the island of Cyprus.

Following a successful campaign, during which the Turkish fleet is entirely destroyed, Othello pitches his camp ashore and sends for Iago and Desdemona. By way of celebrating the reunion with his wife, Othello gives orders for general revelry on the part of his troops. Amid such an atmosphere Iago finds little trouble in conceiving a plan for the further undoing of Othello.

During the feast he manages to involve Cassio in a quarrel with Roderigo, and when Othello comes upon the scene he orders Cassio deprived of his commission in the army. Iago then coaxes Cassio to sue for favor and the restoration of his rank through Desdemona, and, hastening to Othello, hints that their is an affair of some sort between his wife and Cassio. The Moor will not believe his wife false to him, and yet is much hurt when she urges him to restore Cassio to his rank of chief lieutenant.

Meanwhile Iago obtains a handkerchief which Othello had given Desdemona and cautioned her to guard with her life, and this he manages to convey to Cassio. It is then only necessary for him to tell Othello of the handkerchief which Cassio has to arouse the Moorish general to fury. Othello faces Cassio and secures the handkerchief. Believing Desdemona to be untrue to him, he hastens to her apartments and strangles her with the bed linen. Too late, Emilia, wife of Iago, and the devoted friend of Desdemona, tells Othello that his wife is innocent, as she herself found the handkerchief and gave it to her husband. Realizing that he has misjudged Desdemona and killed her who was without fault, Othello draws his own weapon and cuts his throat, dying at the side of his bride.

Though it is not shown in the film, the story ends by Cassio becoming governor of Cyprus and sentencing Iago to a lingering torture.

New Features of Animatograph

The manufacturers of the Animatograph claim that the main point of superiority of their machine over others is illumination. That is what the people demand. They are accustomed to the big, brilliant image they see at the motion picture theater and they expect that same quality of image under any other conditions, whether in the church, school or in their own home. In producing the Animatograph the manufacturers kept this point uppermost in view, and the Animatograph as it now stands is fully capable of producing a 10 to 12-foot image of satisfactory brilliancy.

The surprising feature is that this illumination is secured with a lamp which uses not over 10 amperes. The lamp is adjustable for either 5 to 10 amperes to allow attachment direct to any incandescent lamp socket on the ordinary lighting circuits, or to a line capable of carrying 10 amperes. High illumination with a low power lamp has been made possible by the adoption of a new optical system which conforms to the motion picture aperture and not to the standard slide aperture. The mechanism of the Animatograph, which embodies a number of new features, also assists in taking advantage of as much of the light as possible, and all these elements combined resulted in the effect that has so long been sought for in portable motion picture apparatus.

The claim of simplicity is a common one, even by manufacturers of nearly every article on the market, but the Animatograph is truly simple. It is a fact that it can be set up, after being removed from carrying cases, threaded and put to work with the image properly focused on the screen in less than three minutes' time.

Rembusch Plant to Indiana

Under the date of June 23 the Indianapolis Star contains the following news item regarding the Mirror Screen Company which follows:

Shelbyville, Ind., is to have a $12,000 enterprise. The Mirror Screen Company, manufacturing the Rembusch patented mirror screen for motion picture theaters, is making arrangements to produce its entire output in Shelbyville. The company, although having its headquarters in this city, has been manufacturing its screens at plants in Fort City, Pa., and Crystal City, Mo. The new plant, ninety by ninety feet, is now under construction and will be ready for occupancy in six weeks. The factory will employ twenty-five men. Frank J. Rembusch is president of the company and he brought the factory here so that he could give it his personal attention.

"The Spitfire" An Unusual Picture

Carlyle Blackwell Featured

IN "THE SPITFIRE," the latest release of the Famous Players' Film Company, the unmistakable touch of that wizard of production, Edwin Stanton Porter, is seen. For what is perhaps the most striking light and shadow effect yet given to filmdom is instanced in this picture and its inspiration could come from no one but Mr. Porter, though Frederick Thompson was co-producer with Mr. Porter on this picture.

Scene from "The Spitfire," in which Carlyle Blackwell is featured.

The scenes instanced are those in which Carlyle Blackwell engages in a fistic battle with the man who enters his hotel room for the purpose of stealing precious jewels. The room is in darkness, save for the light from the electric torch carried by the intruder and which flashes around the room until it rests on the face of the room's sleeping occupant. Then Blackwell awakens, there is a battle in which chairs are upset, the clothing torn from the bed, the shoulder of Blackwell's pajamas torn away, and then finally Backwell is the victor and throws his opponent limply into a chair. And all this has been told with the aid of a soft shaft of light from the window and the recurrent flashes of the electric torch. It makes a wonderful bit of photography, and is clearly a Porter one.

"The Spitfire" might be briefly described as a melodramatic farce in which laughs and thrills are so carefully balanced and so essential to the trend of the story that it keeps one guessing from the start as to whether the theme is comedy or serious drama.

This famous nautical comedy-drama, which has to its credit more than one thousand performances on the speaking stage, becomes, in its four-reel film version, a picture to interest and entertain the most exacting lover of either light drama or romance with its tense situations and its apparently unsurmountable obstacles, incidents and misunderstandings.

The scenes, settings and photography are handled in the masterly way that has become characteristic of Famous Players' pictures. A most realistic scene in the first reel shows Morson, a young American traveler, journeying Egypt, accompanied by several white-turbaned native attendants. The customs, people and traveling equipment are all typical of the desert land. Nothing but the knowledge that the distance is too great to be traveled for the sake of a few hundred feet of film betrays the fact that it was not.

Most of the action revolves around Bruce Morson, the role played by Carlyle Blackwell, an ideal type for this brave, adventurous American. Morson and Valda Girard (Violet Merserau) furnish the comedy in the story; Miss Girard, because of her ill-concealed admiration for Morson and her unsuccessful attempts to despise him and show him his place as a common deck-hand, and Morson, because of the unconcerned manner in which he receives her rebukes.

The "heavy" is played by Lionel Adams as James Ormond, the brains of a band of crooks, who arranges the scheme and allows his confederates, Tracy (Robert Cummings) and Beasley (W. R. Dunn) to do the physical work.

Marcus Girard, the owner of the yacht Spitfire and father of Valda, is portrayed by Redfield Clark, an excellent type for the powerful millionaire. June Dale and Lois Arnold take the parts of Cousin Polly and Aunt Mary, Valda's invited guests on the Spitfire's cruise to Europe. With the above mentioned experienced cast, well directed, the picture becomes all that it had promised to be, a story with an absorbing dramatic element punctuated with humorous situations and thrilling incidents.

The girls meet the new captain.

The first reel is the origination of a series of guesses or surmises which become either strengthened or weakened by the developments of the story, until the last reel, when Valda apparently loses all faith in Morson, and then, in the last scene, they become reunited through his heroism and fulfill the lurking hope that has been in the watcher's mind from the first.

While traveling in Egypt Bruce Morson, a young American, befriends a sheik and in return, as a sign of gratitude, is presented with a number of valuable jewels. While stopping at a London hotel Morson is marked for a victim by James Ormond, who outlines a plan whereby his confederates are to rob Morson that night and meet him on the yacht Spitfire at Calais when they get there.

Previous to this Ormond has made the acquaintance of Marcus Girard, the owner of the Spitfire, has schemed to get the yacht and to this end has managed to have one of his men appointed first mate. In constant communication with his confederate, he learns of Girard's visit to London and the opportunity to steal the yacht during his absence. He acts immediately on the suggestion, arranges by wire with the captain to have him act under Ormond's orders, signing the telegrams in Girard's name and goes to take charge of the boat and awaits the arrival of his confederates. One of them Morson overpowers and from him obtains their plans of sailing on the Spitfire.

As the boat is about to sail Morson manages to get aboard by a ruse, and promptly falls in love with Valda, Girard's daughter. Knowing that the absent member of the band must have "squealed," Ormond defeats Morson's chances of enlisting Valda in his cause by telling her that Morson is a customs officer who has come aboard to spy on them, as they are guarding some of her father's jewels, exhibiting the jewels stolen from the young American.

After attempting to tell his story to Valda, Morson is forced to work his way as a deck-hand and, though admiring Morson as much as Morson loves her, Valda forces herself to become a little tyrant in order, as she thinks, to make him keep in his place.

Valda puts the jewels Ormond showed her in the safe and, in order to recover them, the crook blows open the safe and manages to have the blame laid on Morson. Unable to prove his innocence he is made a prisoner. At this point flames are discovered in the hold and all rush for the lifeboats except Valda, who remembers the prisoner, bound and helpless. She cuts his bonds and they escape over the side, Morson swimming and helping Valda to keep her head above water. Marooned on a reef, Morson reminds Valda of her calling him a thief and to prove his guilt states his intention of stealing her.

Reconciliated, the happy couple discover an approaching yacht, whose occupant proves to be Marcus Girard, who traced the Spitfire by wireless and had set out to overtake it.

Eclair "Scientia" Films

Through special and exclusive arrangement with the Strand Theater of New York, six hundred "Scientia" films have already been made by the Eclair Film Company, Inc., of Paris, London and New York, and four educational subjects are now being turned out regularly each week. The Eclair films embrace a wide variety of educational subjects, including scenics, scientific demonstrations, travel-films in various countries, geographical instruction, and wonderful natural history lessons fascinatingly told. "Scientia" films will be leased or sold to educational societies, universities or reputable theaters. A considerable amount of money and a great deal of time and energy have been consumed by the Eclair Company, Inc., in producing and cataloging its library of scientific and instructive films and in order to show them in a manner and place befitting their world embracing value and influence it was decided to present them at the Strand Theater, the De Luxe Motion Picture House of the world.

Fitzmaurice Now a Director

George T. Fitzmaurice, who has been for some time at the head of the scenario department of Pathe Freres, has become a director. Mr. Fitzmaurice has written an exceptionally fine scenario for a six-reel feature and is directing the production himself. He has as his leading man William Rosell in one of the biggest casts that has ever been used in an American production. It is estimated that it will cost $50,000 to produce this feature, owing to the exceptionally artistic sets and extremely rare backgrounds which are used in the different scenes.

We have no doubt that Mr. Fitzmaurice will make as big a success of the producing end of the photoplay as he did when in charge of the scenario department. George Brackett Seitz has succeeded Mr. Fitzmaurice as head of the scenario department.

Through the influence of Frank Henry Rice, a photoplay broker and playwright, the Universal Film Company has secured the motion picture rights to several of the most popular novels of Alfred Henry Lewis and is at present negotiating for the remainder of his works.

Sans Grease Paint and Wig

By Mabel Condon

Lottie Briscoe

IT was a hot sticky day; the kind that Philadelphia writhes under and that Philadelphians rush to Atlantic City to escape. And it was a day that Lottie Briscoe chose to go forth and shop.

"I wouldn't buy anything on a day like this unless it had ice in it," growled Arthur Johnson, turning from the registry desk of the Hotel Hanover, where the request to see Lottie Briscoe had been made in vain.

"Well I, for one, would enjoy something with ice in it right now," accepted Florence Hackett and when we started off for the something that would be mostly ice she remembered that the hotel fan she was wielding would be an acceptable addition to her dressing-room at the Lubin studio, so brought it with her.

We had the ice and an auto ride about Philadelphia and then followed a rush to the four-ten train; and I had the disappointment of not having met Lottie Briscoe. But the next day a violet-inked and gold-tinted note from Miss Briscoe told me she was sorry she had shopped that additional crepe blouse, as only for that she would have been back at her hotel in time. But maybe I would come to Philadelphia soon?

That was almost a year ago; and just before the three-weeks ago New York convention, I again visited the Lubin studio. It was just after Mae B. Havey, of the Lubin scenario staff, had said "Let's call on Rosemary Theby and Anna Luther," that she changed her mind and tapped on a door that admitted us with a welcome "Come in" from somebody. And the somebody was Lottie Briscoe.

"Mr. Johnson told me how you had all waited for me that melting day while I was buying other things and a crepe blouse," she remembered, with a warm smile and a warm hand-shake.

I replied that I remembered too, perfectly, and guessed that she must just have been shopping again, for she wore the freshest of dimity frocks with white mull vest and lapels setting off its pinkness, while the frock bespoke its utter newness by the length of its tunic.

"Yes, yesterday," Miss Briscoe agreed with a laugh that revealed the double-row of pretty teeth for which she has long since been famous.

"I shop just once a month; it's a regular ceremony with me and after I have given a day to it, I'm through for another whole month. I buy things I need and things I think I'll need and those of the things that I think I'll need and find out at the end of the month, that I haven't needed at all, I put away in my emergency trunk—that one that Miss Havey is sitting on—and sometime or other, I find, they always come in handy."

"And that crepe blouse?" I asked, wondering if the irony of fate on that day almost-a-year-ago could have classed it among the-things-I-think-I'll-need; the while Arthur Johnson fumed at the heat, Florence Hackett fanned with the circular card-board that advertised the hotel Hanover, and I found that I couldn't wait and catch my train too.

"No—that," Miss Briscoe vindicated, "was on the things-I-need list." Encouraged at this proof of kindness on the part of Fate, I wondered if Miss Briscoe would have time, right then, to tell me the things I had come to ask months ago.

"Yes; we're waiting for Mr. Johnson to begin a scene in 'The Last Rose'—that three-reel play of yours, Miss Havey!—so I have nothing to do now but wait. What shall I tell you?"

"Everything."

"But—" Miss Briscoe remonstrated, then settled back on one foot and the window-seat and began:

"St. Louis gave me both my start in life and my start on the stage; the first was on October first, 1892, and the second was four years later. It was with McKee Rankin as the boy in the play 'The Runaway Wife' that I started and after that there were many child parts and after that, there were years with Richard Mansfield and Augustus Daly and three years in the principal role in 'Editha's Burglar,' the creation of the female lead in 'For Fair Virginia,' the character of 'Claude' in 'The Two Vagrants,' two and one-half years with the Original stock company at the Orpheum in Philadelphia, and a road tour throughout the states."

"No wonder the people in Milwaukee know you so well, then," I suggested and Miss Havey came forth with the information—

"And in Portland, Maine, too. I have a cousin there who says the people pride themselves on having seen Lottie Briscoe."

"Well!" Miss Briscoe politely exclaimed and after a short pause Miss Havey and I answered, "Well?"

"In 1910," the Lubin leading lady resumed, "I signed a years contract as lead with the Essanay company in Chicago, and I was the first legitimate star to go into pictures, as a business venture. During that year at the Essanay studio, Francis X. Bushman came into the company and he made his first appearance on the screen opposite me. The end of the year showed me what a perfectly good venture going into pictures had been. It also let me know that I needed a rest, so instead of signing again with the Essanay company, I took a trip to Europe. I was gone for months, and when I returned, I joined the Imp company and played opposite King Baggot.

"A little later, the Majestic company was formed and again I signed as lead and this time Owen Moore played opposite me. It was in February, 1912, that I left the Majestic to come to the Lubin studio and Arthur Johnson and I have played together ever since. And that's all," she finished, untucking the foot that had gone to sleep during her narration.

"My foot often goes to sleep," consoled Miss Havey from the top of the emergency trunk.

"I wouldn't mind, only—" began Miss Briscoe, but stopped at the signal of a violent summons on the door.

"The door's locked, I guess," called Miss Briscoe.

"I see that it is," returned a deep voice that anyone would guess belonged to Arthur Johnson.

"Scene's waiting—" he began, as Miss Briscoe opened the door. He knew Miss Havey, of course, and then recalled the day of last July when we waited for Lottie Briscoe while Lottie Briscoe shopped. In the months since then, Mr. Johnson has grown stouter and the added weight is assuredly becoming.

"And now for 'The Last Rose'," he suggested, after a while, so we went out into the studio nearest the Briscoe dressing room and Miss Havey and I watched a scene in which Mr. Johnson directed Miss Briscoe in the gentle art of powdering her nose and summoning her maid Celeste. Then we hurried off to the Theby-Luther dressing-room where somebody had to perch on the table so the others of us could have the chairs. By popular acclaim the one on the table had the right to talk the most; so she did.

"Uriel Acosta" Released

The Great Players Feature Film Corporation has released the story of "Uriel Acosta," in five parts, featuring B. Adler and Rosetta Conn, both being well known on the dramatic stage for the excellence of their work.

Scene from "Uriel Acosta," Great Players production.

Lubin Mourns Lost Negatives

Few persons who patronize motion pictures today are familiar with some of the old style pictures, as they were manufactured but a dozen years ago. Every manufacturer of note regards his first efforts with a keen degree of sentiment. About these old films which are now used largely for either foreign or stock productions, centers a great deal of pride; for in those days the industry had not reached the high state of development which exists today. Imagine, then, if you can, what must be the loss to a manufacturer who is forced to realize that every one of his historic negatives and the first prints of his first pictures are destroyed.

The recent fire of the Lubin plant in Philadelphia, apart from the financial loss of a half-million dollars worth of films that could not be insured, caused Siegmund Lubin many a heart ache which even this stoical business man could not well conceal. Films that were made in his little unassuming laboratory and which represented his first efforts meant almost as much to him as the beautiful productions which cost him thirty and forty thousands dollars to make at the present time.

Stanley Lowry, who was custodian of the Lubin vaults, viewing the ruins of $500,000 worth of films.

Probably one of the films which Mr. Lubin prized as highly as any which he lost was that of President McKinley and his cabinet at Camp Alger during the Spanish-American War. He also possessed a valuable film which showed the funeral of the martyred president, as well as some films of funerals of foreign monarchs. When the Lubin Company started to manufacture and produce well known plays "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was one of the first which the firm made, and Mr. Lubin himself essayed the part of Simon Legree and his acting and the entire picture was one of the films which the Philadelphia manufacturer prized as highly as almost any other film in his plant. Among the other important films which can never be replaced and which are included in Mr. Lubin's losses are pictures of the Pan-American Exposition, the Buffalo and the Paris Exposition, the Galveston disaster, the San Francisco earthquake, the Transvaal war, and the almost priceless films showing the war between Russia and Japan and the bombardment of Port Arthur.

This great collection of films would not be complete without a mention of the pictures which Mr. Lubin possessed of record-making athletic contest and these, too, were all lost. Among these of special interest were the films of the Dixon-Gans fight, the Corbett-McGovern fight, and a picture of the crucial game of the baseball season of 1902, when Rube Waddell pitched the Athletics to their first American League championship.

The most peculiar part of the fire was the fact that every one of the Lubin films had been stored in a steel and concrete vault which was supposed to be fireproof and able to resist every explosive force. Each of these vaults was lighted from above by small prisms, and the rays of the sun, beating through these magnifying glasses, formed a direct conductor of heat that set fire to the films and later exploded the gases, which could not be carried off through the ventilating system that had been installed. With the rebuilding of the vaults, in which will be stored the new negatives, Mr. Lubin has planned for the construction of a lighting system that will not give rise to any such condition as caused the recent fire.

"Manon Lescaut" Plays Republic

The Republic Theater in New York has been drawing record crowds since the beginning of the big Playgoers' feature "Manon Lescaut." With Lina Cavalieri and Lucien Muratore in the leading roles it is no wonder that this four part feature has proved such a drawing card.

Being a costume play of the years 1719-20 and everything in accordance with that period, regardless of expense or trouble, the production is generally conceded to be one of the costliest that has ever been made. In taking scenes in the precise localities described by the author, Abbe Prevost, the principal members of the company traveled over 10,000 miles.

The typically French exteriors and beautiful interior settings make an artistic and appropriate background for this immortal story of love and romance. The photography is of the best, praiseworthy subdued light effects being secured in the twilight and night scenes.

With the famous beauty, Cavalieri, in the leading role and the other parts being played up to the set standard "all-star" acting by an attractive cast was assured.

Manon Lescaut is sent away to a convent by her father, a fanatically religious man. On the way she meets and falls in love with the Chevalier Des Grieux, who aids her in escaping the vigilance of her escorting party and together they flee to Paris. The rich Count De Bretigny is attracted by Manon's beauty and schemes to separate her from the chevalier. As a result De Grieux is taken home by force and Manon made to believe that he has deserted her. Heartbroken and without money, Manon accepts De Bretigny's protection.

Lucien Muratore as Chevalier Des Grieux; W. L. Abingdon as Baron de Bretigny and Mme. Lina Cavalieri as Manon in "Manon Lescout."

The chevalier quarrels with his father, is banished from home, and, on returning to Paris and being informed that Manon is living with De Bretigny, denounces the world and is about to take holy orders at St. Sulpice when Manon, having discovered the trick played upon them, bursts in on his meditations and induces him to fly with her.

Manon's unprincipled brother, Lescaut, enlists with De Bretigny and manages to have his sister brought to the count's house, where she is kept prisoner. After a series of heroic attempts De Grieux rescues her from the wicked count's power.

In financial straits the chevalier gambles at a fashionable Paris club, is accused of cheating at cards, and both he and Manon are thrown into prison. The chevalier escapes, but, in attempting to affect Manon's release their carefully laid plans are defeated by the guards, and his sweetheart doomed to be shipped to New France in America.

This pretty scene is a bit from Playgoer's release of Manon Lescaut in which Mme. Lina Cavalieri is featured.

The chevalier hides himself in the hold of the boat carrying Manon and on their arrival in New Orleans pleads with the governor to allow their marriage. He gives his consent, but just as they are to be married sends word to stop the wedding, having been prompted by his nephew, who has been attracted by Manon's beauty.

In a rage De Grieux challenges the governor's nephew and in the duel that follows runs him through, leaving him for dead. He rushes home, tells Manon what he has done and together they seek a hiding place in the woods. After wandering for several days without food, and unable to find their way back to the settlement, Manon's strength gives out. On his return a short time later, having tried to push on alone in the search for help, the chevalier finds his beloved dead. His hopes of their being married and living peacefully are blighted and, weakened by his own hardships in the past few days and the added agony of seing Manon suffer, De Grieux sinks on his sweetheart's grave—a broken-hearted man, and the governor's soldiers, scouring the woods for the chevalier come upon his dead body lying across a freshly dug grave.

New Thrill for MacDermott

Having in innumerable ways tried to shorten Marc MacDermott's existence, the Edison company in the latest release of "The Man Who Disappeared" series, has placed him in an aeroplane, which races at break-neck speed against an express train, but again the fiery-haired star has come through without a scratch.

The story is filled with action and the novel race is exceedingly thrilling. All the players portray their characters with the same splendid understanding which has characterized the other pictures of this story. The Edison synopsis of the latest release reads as follows:

It will be remembered that Nelson Wales had put his sister into considerable danger and difficulty on account of the fact that that amiable young man had forged her name to a mortgage. John Perriton, the man who disappeared for Mary's sake, saved her from an unpleasant situation. The next day he came to the Wales' house to call Nelson to account.

Confronted by his sister, and the angry Perriton, Nelson, at first, attempted to bluster his way out of the situation. When that failed to produce the desired impression, he locked Perriton and Mary into a room, and telephoned to the police that he had captured John Perriton, the murderer.

While they were locked in the room, John told Mary the truth about the murder—that Nelson had killed the butler, and that he, Perriton, had shouldered the responsibility for her sake. Mary, filled with horror, none the less believed Perriton's story.

The police arrived at the front door, and John escaped through the window, directing Mary to meet him at a certain station on the railway line. John climbed to the roof by means of a rain spout, and after a desperate race with the detectives, succeeded in completely eluding them.

At Nelson's suggestion, the detectives, foiled in their pursuit of Perriton, turned their attention to his sister. They followed her aboard the express train which she took to keep her appointment with Perriton. Mary, discovering that she was followed, sent a telegram to the train she knew Perriton had taken, telling him that she would elude the detectives, and would meet him at Vernontown, a junction point, where they could catch a north-bound express. Mary succeeds in eluding the detectives, by the clever ruse of leaving the train, and quickly slipping back aboard just as it was starting.

Meanwhile, Perriton's train had broken down. Realizing that everything depended on making the connection Mary had planned, he was at his wits' end. The accident to the train would certainly make him miss the connection.

An aeroplane meet in the vicinity of the accident solved the difficulty. Perriton hired an aeroplane as the express came into sight. Mounting into the air, the great birdlike machine raced for miles against the speeding train, and reached Vernontown in time.

The Optigraph Home Projector

The Optigraph Manufacturing Company at 1010 First National Bank building, Chicago, has just placed on the market the Optigraph No. 6 home projecting machine. This is a motion picture and stereopticon projector using standard films and stereopticon slides. It will project any size picture desired and is so simple in construction that it can be operated by any one whether they are familiar with motion picture machines or not.

The machine, complete, weighs only 20 pounds and is in compact style. It is so constructed that it can be set on any camera tripod or collapsible stand. It uses a standard one-pin Geneva movement, has a cylindrical type shutter, which is adjusted permanently and entirely enclosed, therefore free from accidental breakage.

An automatic fire shutter which is positive in its action has been installed on this machine. In fact, the machine cannot be stopped without the fire shutter dropping into place and protecting the film. The magazines are also fireproof, the same as on a projecting machine used in a regular theater. The magazines are equipped with valves where the film enters or leaves, and are equipped with rollers which prevent any fire from entering the magazines.

The arc lamp has a carrying capacity of from 3½ to 30 amperes and will take carbons from ¼ to ⅝ inches in size, these being standard and procurable anywhere. All of the light adjustments are made with one handle, which is outside of the lamp house and is self centered. The ventilation of the lamp house is perfect and the rheostat is entirely enclosed in the lamp house proper.

The shutter can be operated from any electric light socket or can be used with calcium or acetylene gas apparatus. The machine complies with all existing laws, and lamp houses to conform with various city regulations are carried in stock and it is only necessary for a customer to specify what city he lives in, in order to receive the proper type of apparatus.

The lens is furnished with Bausch and Lomb lenses and projects clear and definite pictures with wonderful sharpness extending to the very edges.

The Optigraph Company states that it is willing to guarantee its machine against any and all defects and to guarantee it to operate perfectly while the user is complying with the instructions furnished with the apparatus. As the Optigraph was formerly made as a standard theater projection machine and thousands of them sold throughout the country for use in that way, the machine has had a very rigid test and the present model No. 6 is an improvement on everything that has gone before in this type of machine. The price of the machine is $100 and we would suggest that those interested write the Optigraph Manufacturing Company, mentioning this publication, for further details.

A Pair of Pathe Educationals

Among the recent Pathe educational releases are found two of exceptional merit, one dealing with life in a West African village and the other illustrating the sights in the Paris Zoo.

The first film describes the little old Senegalese town of St. Louis which is one of the principal French possessions in West Africa. It is situated about twelve miles from the mouth of the river on a low level flood plan. The peculiar and primitive customs of the country are shown when we see a "Yolof" or Senegalese woman doing her washing out doors. Leading to Guet N'dar, the French have constructed a fine modern bridge for local traffic. The Faidhuke Bridge a little further on is one of the largest on the west coast. A glimpse of Avenue Dodds, the principal street of St. Louis, gives one a pleasing impression of the town, one of the most imposing edifices of which is the Palace of the Governor General of Senegal. Of all scenes, however, that of the St. Louis market bustling with all its trafficers and bargainers is perhaps the most characteristic and unique. One does not leave St. Louis without looking up some of the old Senegal rug weavers, for Senegal rugs are known the world over, and the weaver of St. Louis is distinctive. "Sor" lying close to St. Louis is a characteristic suburb.

In the latter we see strangely formed animals and birds which are always of quite as much interest to the grown-up as to the youngster, to whom they afford an unending source of amusement. In the wonderful Paris Zoo are to be found perfect specimens of almost every type, from the strangely striped Zebra and multi-colored Parrot of the tropics, to the cumbersome Yak and awkward Penguin of the semi-polar regions. Most beautful of the water fowl species are the graceful milk white swans on the pond. Pony phaetons, goat carriages, camels and elephants slow striding and majestic in bearing provide strange and fearsome modes of transportation for hundreds of children. The spotted deer, the curious Eru, big-billed Pelicans, vain, glorious Peacocks, tall Giraffes, Sea-lions sleek and playful, and last but not least of all Monkeys of all sizes, shapes and descriptions, jabbering in their jungle language, make the Paris Zoo one of the most delightfully entertaining places of the great French capital.

"Germania" at Strand Theater

During the week of June 28 the Leading Players Film Corporation presented "Germania," the picture adaptation from the libretto of the same title, at the Strand Theater, New York City. The film, which was made by the Savoia Company of Torino, Italy, is a perfect cinematographic reproduction of the famous work. Following is the cast:

The Strand has also completed arrangements with the Eclair companies in London, Paris and New York to supply it with scientific subjects under the title of "Scientia" which are to be made expressly for this theater. An interesting travelogue appears on each bill.

McCarahan Leaves Superior Company

F. C. McCarahan, who has been connected with the Superior Feature Film Company for some time as president and stockholder, has disposed of his interest in that company and resigned his office. His plans for the future will be made public within a few weeks.

The Superior Company will continue its present policy. William O. J. Hattstaedt, who has been Mr. McCarahan's partner, will now have complete charge of the concern and will soon announce an added list of attractive features.

Consul Interested in Pictures

After watching a submarine motion picture camera at work at Nassau, Consul William F. Doty made a complete report of the operations to the government, which is reproduced below.

A submarine motion picture camera, recently invented by an American photographer, has been successfully employed in securing motion pictures of marine vegetation and fish in the harbor at Nassau. These films will be forwarded to New York, and will be placed on exhibition there about the first of July.

The apparatus consists of a flexible metallic tube, 20 inches in diameter, which is composed of a series of units, or sections, of overlapping hinges set in a vertical position, though the tube may be suspended at any particular angle. The pressure of the water bends the joints inward and causes the hinges to fall downward; thus the weight is increased, the different sections are easily lowered, and the tube becomes automatically poised, even when the float or barge above is being rocked by the action of the waves. A strong rubber covering renders the tube impervious to the water. This tube descends through the wellhole of the float or barge.

To complete the device there is a ball-shaped terminal chamber at the lower end of the tube. In it ordinary atmospheric conditions are maintained, as the upper end of the tube is always open, and the operator experiences no unpleasant effects while working in it. Attached to the chamber there is a funnel in the shape of a truncated cone provided at the larger (outer) end with a glass port 1½ inches thick. The length of this funnel is 6 feet, in order to give the correct focus for photographing through the port.

During ordinary daylight in the Nassau Harbor artificial light is not necessary, and at night about nine Cooper-Hewitt (mercury vapor) lamps and reflectors are sufficient, the frame being lowered to the proper range. The operator (photographer) sits in the terminal or work chamber many hours at a time, taking motion pictures at his ease. The operator in charge here was formerly an expert photographer in the United States Government service.

The results of the pictures taken in Nassau Harbor have been quite successful, the marine gardens, fish of many varieties, old rocks with divers descending among them, anchors at a depth of 100 feet, and sharks and other monsters at their deadly work all show up with great clearness. It is remarkable that the photographs reveal nothing above the surface of the water. The effect of a picture of a swimmer is weird if his head and a portion of his body are out of the water. The face of one looking down through a water glass can, however, be photographed from below. It will prove of great interest to biologists and school children, as well as to the general public, to learn that the son of the inventor of the tube fought a shark 12 feet below the surface of the water. He fought single handed, with only a knife for his protection, and had neither helmet or suit of protective material. As this fight was successfully photographed from within the tube, valuable information will be secured on the methods of attacks by sharks.

It appears that no cinematograph worthy of the name has been taken by others at more than 2 or 3 feet below the surface of water, so that this apparatus is unique, for pictures have been taken with it at a depth of about 30 feet.

As a noted American physicist is of the opinion that the tube may be made 1,000 feet in length, the device is of great importance in many lines of scientific inquiry in oceanography.

An interesting use will be the location of treasure ships, many of which lie just outside of harbors. Salvage operations will be arranged through mechanical arms with mittens, into which a man can thrust his arm and hand from the interior of the work chamber. This work or salvage chamber will have many glass ports and the human arm will be supplemented by electricity and compressed air. Naval and merchant vessels should find the tubes and work chambers adaptable for inspection of hulls and repairs at sea, rather than seek port to be docked.

The pearl fishery and sponge industry will likely find this device revolutionary, as some of the best specimens lie at depths too great for the diving helmet. Ordinarily it is unsafe to work in a diving suit below 70 feet, yet the oyster pearl (nacre) is often found 150 feet deep, and it is said that the sponge growth in many sections is still deeper. Naturally there are numerous ways in which this submarine-tube system will prove helpful.

Excelsior Leading Man in Paris

In one of the realistic scenes from "The Toll of Mammon," made by the Excelsior Feature Film Company of 110 West Fortieth street, New York, it was necessary, for the sake of atmosphere, to get a scene in prison showing the convicts at their daily work. The warden of one of New York's largest prisons was approached and consented only after much weight had been brought to bear upon him. Director Harry Handworth brought his camera into the various parts of the building and soon had the necessary scenes. They were taken without any artificial lighting and are perfectly natural. Gordon De Maine, the leading man for the Excelsior Company became a real convict for the time being, and later laughingly said he made several friends among the regular "honest to goodness" inmates.

Famous Players to Present Paul McAllister

The Famous Players Film Company will present as its release of July 20 the popular American actor, Paul McAllister, in the tensely thrilling drama of love versus the law, "The Scales of Justice," by John Reinhart. Mr. McAllister is admirably suited, both physically and temperamentally, to the role of Robert Darrow, the earnest and conscientious young district attorney, tortured by his conflict between his duty to the state on the one hand and his love for the woman whom he must prosecute for murder on the other.

Mr. McAllister has won laurels in a series of metropolitan engagements as leading man with Mrs. Leslie Carter and Miss Viola Allen, and also in his excellent characterization of the artist in Mr. Steven's production of "The Devil."

Mary Fuller Joins Universal

Miss Mary Fuller, one of the biggest stars in the motion picture world, is leaving the Edison Company on the fifteenth of July to join the Universal Company. Miss Fuller's long association with the Thomas A. Edison brand of pictures makes the change quite a surprise to those in this branch of the profession. She wishes to state that her affiliation with the company has been a very happy one, and that she leaves with much regret personally, leaving behind her as she does warm friends both among the executives and the actors. Her reason for the change is because she believes it to be a step toward a bigger future and greater financial advancement. Miss Fuller's ambitions are very high, and she hopes some day to be a big factor in the theatrical world. Interesting things are planned for her under the Universal program, and her vast army of admirers will look forward to her new releases with great anticipation. Miss Fuller's new offer, besides a princely salary, includes a star proposition which will place her in great prominence.

To See Hite Submarine Films

From amongst the flock of picture magnates who bid for the marketing rights of the new "photographed-under-the-ocean" films, made by the submarine-picture-taking invention of the Williamson brothers of Norfolk, Va., Charles J. Hite, of Thanhouser-Mutual fame, was the lucky one. He will shortly "open" them at his Broadway Rose Gardens, the "society" playhouse where New York fashionables may see motion pictures and then dine, or even dance. After this the film will be shown to leading scientific bodies and will then go on a tour of the big theaters of the country. Special Representative Bert Adler is in charge of bookings.

To Film Famous Novels

The first release of the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation, a newcomer in the producing game, will be "The Seats of the Mighty," a picture adapted from the novel of the same name by Sir Gilbert Parker, which will be ready for distribution early in July.

The film is in six parts and the cast is composed of several stars whose popularity with the picture fans has long been established, among whom are Lionel Barrymore, Glen White, Millicent Evans and Lois Meredith.

Following this first release several other pictures, taken from some of the most successful novels of the age will be presented, "The Iron Woman," "Sir Richard Calmady," "The Adventures of Wallingford," "The Gentleman from Indiana," "54-40 or Fight," "The Blindness of Virtue," and many others having already been secured.

PERSONAL NOTES.

He seemed terribly in earnest; yet he smiled. "That's right, I tell you; they fired me." It was William Wilkie Johnston, the "Perils of Pauline" advertising man speaking and, because he was who he was, his statement sounded doubtful. And besides—he smiled.

"Yep, they fired me from this job," he went on, and after a pause that promised much or nothing, added, "and they made me advertising man of both Pathe and Eclectic films. It's about three months since I came here," Mr. Johnston answered a question as he filled his pipe from that glass jar that is the joint property of Mr. Johnston and A. C. Kappen, who occupies the opposite desk. "Nothing to tell before that," he demurred, succeeding in lighting the pipe with the third match he tried.

"Nothing of interest," he added. "There's something I'm proud of, however, and I don't mind if you say so. It's the fact that I'm a Canadian. A little town outside of London, Ontario, was my birth-place, and I'm proud of being a Britisher. Why, just look at what that lone British officer did down in Mexico just recently! Rescued 400 people all by himself. And look at—"

Then he noticed his pipe was out and forgot about being a Britisher, and informed us that he came to the Eclectic company three months ago from the Frank Presbrey advertising agency. "There were six years that I spent in the Canadian west; I was a cow-puncher—but you needn't say anything about that. I was in a part of the country for nineteen months where we had only one mail delivery in all that time. Two years ago, I came to the states. And I'll stay as long as the states continue to smile upon me. Otherwise—well, there's always Canada!" And the tall, slender, dark young advertising manager of Pathe and Eclectic films, puffed on his pipe and smiled.

B. P. Schulberg has become a commuter for the summer months, he and his family having deserted their cozy Harlem flat for hotel service at Arverne-on-the-sea. There is no doubt in Mr. Schulberg's agile mind but what the three-months old Seymour Wilson Schulberg will be a full-grown man and a champion swimmer by the time the fall beckons them back to New York.

George D. Proctor spent last week in a visit to the folks back home in Massachusetts, and on his return, began with renewed vigor on his agreeable task of writing advertising and sending out other publicity on the theme of Popular Plays and Players.

Hector J. Streyckmans superintended the wrecking of a five-passenger car, Saturday. Four cameras were trained on the accident in which a railroad train also featured. The scene was part of the five-reel feature which the Hector Film Corporation is making and in which Miss Beulah Poynter is playing the lead, supported by John J. Bowers, now playing in "The Family Cupboard" at the Playhouse, New York.

H. B. Muller for the last few weeks has borne the title, general manager of the Great Players Film Corporation and is perfectly at home in the duties the name implies. Chief of these duties is the exploitation of the five-part releases "Escaped from Siberia" and "Uriel Acosta." Mr. Muller was formerly of Warners' Features and the Industrial Motion Picture Company.

"Sheriff" Mackley's Western make-up and productions have long been known as being authentic to the dot. When directing in the R & M studio, though not intending to appear in a scene at all, Mackley is dressed in his picturesque attire, even to high boots, sombrero, and gun, just to give "atmosphere" to the place, which greatly stimulates the actors working under him.

Friends of Val Paul, of the McRae 101 Bison company are offering the young Universal actor belated congratulations. It was known last year that Cupid had been busy using Paul's heart as a short range target. The night before the McRae Company was to sail to Hawaii the young actor proposed a plan and—well, Mrs. Paul was Miss May Foster, and the trip which has just been completed served as their honeymoon.

Miss Ethel Clayton of the Lubin Company received notification from the Onyx Club, who have branches throughout the southwest, that she was awarded second prize in their Photoplay Favorite contest, she having received twenty-five thousand votes. This makes the fourth club contest in which the Lubin leading lady has competed and in all four she received first or second prize.

In the subject "The Dream Ship" produced by Harry Pollard of the Beauty company, are used many properties of inestimable value. One rug alone is placed at a value of over $10,000.00 The chair used as a throne is one that was originally the property of a Spanish King.

Jack Blystone, new director of Joker comedies, with Bess Meredyth as leading woman, and Ernest Shields as leading man, is now producing a slapstick entitled "The Third Party" at the West Coast studios of the Universal Company.

Charles M. Seay now needs but a twenty dollar gold piece to complete the novel chain for his new gold watch. Mere trifle—even though some people buy several chains for a twenty dollar gold piece and have enough change left to buy a watch.

Misses Ormi Hawley and Eleanor Barry, who are supporting Andrew Mack in "The Ragged Earl," the feature picture being made by the Popular Plays and Players, Inc., have canceled all their social engagements and are spending their evenings rehearsing for the work the following day.

Franc R. E. Woodward has been appointed publicity manager for the Selig Polyscope Company and will make his headquarters at the general offices, 20 E. Randolph St., Chicago.

William Clifford, leading man of the Henry McRae 101 Bison company which has been in the Hawaiian Islands for the past four months, arrived home with the company at 5 o'clock on Saturday, June 20. At four o'clock on Sunday Bill was presented with a bouncing baby daughter, weight nine pounds.

The Newman Mfg. Company, with factories in Cincinnati, New York and Chicago will have quite an attractive and elaborate booth, occupying space No. 20 at the convention to be held in Dayton, July 6 to 11. They will have complete line of the very latest and attractive brass poster frames, easels, railings, and ticket choppers.

The wardrobe used in the original stage production of "The Ragged Earl," which is being filmed by the Popular Plays and Players, Inc., with Andrew Mack in the lead, are being reproduced by a crew especially engaged for this work on the particular picture.

Through the courtesy of William H. Russell, a millionaire living at Anglewood Cliffs, N. J., his immense and beautiful estate on the Hudson River has been turned over to the Lawrence-Victor company to be used for the staging of a two-reel romantic melodrama. Under the direction of Harry Solter, and headed by Miss Florence Lawrence and Matt Moore, the Victor players have been located on the estate for two weeks, working on the picture.

Edna Maison is to be featured in her own company with Ray Gallagher acting opposite and Lloyd Ingraham as director. The first offering is a light comedy-drama entitled "The Divorcee" in which Edna has trouble with unwelcome suitors and her former husband whilst she is acting as cook for a wealthy family.

The Pathe players, who have been in Bermuda for the past few weeks working under the direction of Henry Vernot in a six-reel feature for the Eclectic Company called "Foul Play," have returned to the studio at Jersey City. The company, which included Elmer Woodruff, Harold Meltzer, Riley Hatch and Sheldon Lewis, received the hearty cooperation of the authorities at the Island which permitted them to secure some exceptionally rare scenes.

Following the completion of the "Lucille Love" series Grace Cunard and Francis Ford are leaving Hollywood, Cal., for a short vacation in the east, Mr. Ford going to his home in Portland, Me., while Miss Cunard will visit her folks in New York City. They will be out of pictures for about a month.

It is good to be popular amongst one's own profession, and Myrtle Stedman must have felt happy at the reception accorded her at the Photoplayers club of Los Angeles last Saturday when she displayed both a lovely gown and her beautiful voice in some vocal selections. The Glee Club also proved an added feature to a delightful and successful "ladies' night." These gatherings will be held monthly.

J. P. McGowan, the Kalem actor and producer, has completed a thrilling two reeler, "Liquid Gold," written by himself and Helen Holmes and featuring both of them. It is a tale of the oil fields and the blowing in of an oil well is shown correctly.

William D. Taylor, late of the Vitagraph, who is quite a Broadway favorite by reason of his performance as "Captain Alvarez," has made very good as a director at the Balboa studios. His first production, "The Judge's Wife," was so good that he was at once put on another three reeler "Betty" with himself and Neva Gerber in the leads.

Louise Glaum is much upset—or was. Four dogs and a small car did it. She sat in the latter and drove the former (tried to) in "Triangle Marriage" put on by Harry Edwards at the Universal. Fortunately the upset came just as they passed the camera and Louise was tumbled out on her pretty nose. The dogs smashed the car and had a free-for-all before being rounded up. Louise is to figure in some eastern comedies for a change after the "Universal Ike" series.

Adele Lane of Selig's is working in her first animal picture under Director Morton. During the story she saves her lover with the help of an elephant. Boars and a $5,000 Russian hound figure in the play.

Miss Vivian Rich of the "Flying A" forces had a birthday party recently and all went well until "Billy" Garwood, her leading man, exploded a decorative bomb loaded with confetti, the contents of which showered down upon the table. Garwood then beat a speedy retreat, while the diners picked the chopped up paper out of their food and cussed the nerve of the fugitive.

Cleo Madison is having her taste of acting in two productions at once. She makes a wonderfully classic figure as Hermion with Otis Turner in "Damon and Pythias," and is being featured in the "Trey of Hearts" series with Wilfred Lucas. This series will engage her attention for a long time to come and give her magnificent opportunities for the display of emotional acting. The name of the first picture is "Flower o' the Flames," three-reeler, with a prologue included.

Carlyle Blackwell has had his seven passenger car shipped east from Los Angeles, so it looks as though he was in for a long stay in the metropolis. He writes to his friends that he is working hard and is about to direct and act in "Jack Spurlock, Prodigal." This story should just about suit the mercurial Carlyle, and there is no question regarding his directing ability.

In the midst of the many Lubin players there is one who has performed in the Czar's palace many times in the Russian Emperor's favorite play, "Mazeppa." It is Daniel Makerenko, whose recent portrayal of "Ivan" in "Michael Strogoff" has helped to bring him into the motion picture limelight. During his past twenty years he and his company have toured the Russian provinces and gave performances in all parts of the empire.

Charlie Ray is playing his first minister part in "The Thunderbolt," being put on by Scott Sydney for the Kay Bee. It is a two-reeler, and the heavy is played by that sterling actor, Arthur Jarrett.

Edna Maison has had a week's holiday and candidly says she has not enjoyed it, as she prefers working. The rest was enforced to prepare for her appearance at the head of her own company, which will be directed by Lloyd Ingraham. Ray Gallagher will support Miss Maison and the first photoplay will be a light comedy exploiting Edna as a divorcee and her love affairs.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believoing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in MOTOGRAPHY as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

Bosworth Films Second London Story

Author's Life History

THOSE who have seen Bosworth's wonderful film, "The Sea Wolf," are anticipating with keenest interest the newly announced picture of Jack London's greatest masterpiece, "John Barleycorn," which was released last week.

Readers of the Saturday Evening Post, where the story of "John Barleycorn" first appeared, well remember the thrill of this narrative from the pen of the masterful writer of the realistic school, but for those who have not read the story either in serial or in book form, a short summary of its contents will be interesting.

John Barleycorn is the spirit of drink. Jack London tells his own drastic and gripping experiences with this ogre and the book recounts his life's history from the tender age of five years.

The book starts in an impressive manner with the following paragraph: "I was five years old the first time I got drunk. It was on a hot day, and my father was plowing in the field. I was sent from the house, half a mile away, to carry to him a pail of beer."

Little Jack, who had been cautioned not to let the beer spill, had either to drain some of the beer or disobey, as the pail was filled to the brim. "Why waste it?" he asked himself. "It's good for the grown-ups, why isn't it good for me?"

So he drank some of the beer, got drunk, was nearly killed by falling in front of the plow, and slept off his stupor, "with an appalling conviction of sin."

He began to reform and refused the stuff.

"In the weeks and months that followed," continues the author, "I had no more interest in beer than in the kitchen stove after it had burned me. The grown-ups were right. Beer was not for children. As for me, I could manage to get along well without beer. Yes, and to the day of my death I could have managed to get along quite well without it. But circumstances decreed otherwise. At every turn in the world in which I lived John Barleycorn beckoned. There was no escaping him. All paths led to him. And it took twenty years of contact, of exchanging of greetings and passing on with my tongue in my cheek, to develop in me a sneaking liking for the rascal."

Already sodden, the youthful John was forced to drink more of the liquor.

Jack London's next bout with John Barleycorn was at the age of seven, when he was frightened into drinking, through fear that if he refused the wine offered to him his hosts would stab him in the back.

The terrors and the agony of this situation having been endured but never forgotten, the lad, always irresistibly drawn by the demon of drink, took to drinking with his father. In the language of Jack London: "Here was a child, forming its first judgments of the world, finding the saloon a delightful and desirable place. Stores nor public buildings, nor all the dwellings of men ever opened their doors to me and let me warm by their fires or permitted me to eat the food of the gods from narrow shelves against the wall. Their doors were ever closed to me; the saloon's doors were ever open."

By the time the child was ten years old his family had given up ranching and had gone to the city to live. The lad began on the streets as a newsboy. "I had no time to read," continues the author, "I was busy getting exercise and learning how to fight, busy learning forwardness, brass and bluff."

Having had his previous experiences with drink and saloons the young child in a plastic mood was curious about the city saloons. On one of the streets, from corner to corner, there was a solid block of saloons. "The city fathers sanctioned them and licensed them. They are not the terrible places I heard boys deem them who lacked my opportunities to know," argued the youngster as he dived into the mysteries of the underworld that were so long to claim him as their victim.

From ten to fifteen the lad rarely tasted liquor, had no liking for it—abhorred it in fact. But the paper route included a road house from whence came an offer of a glass of wine which the newsboy was ashamed to refuse. Next he was offered some beer in return for a service but refused and asked for ginger ale. Steamed beer costs a saloon much less than ginger ale. "It was up to me, if I wanted to hold my job," says London, "to drink beer. After that, when I couldn't sneak out of it, I drank beer and wondered what men found in it that was so good. I was always aware that I was missing something."

Next came a wonderful experience for the lad, who was now fourteen years of age. He was sailing in a small boat in San Francisco bay when he had an invitation to go aboard a smuggler from the Sandwich Islands. Great indeed, to the child mind, was this opportunity to see a real sloop engaged in smuggling. Once aboard he was offered a drink. Was he any less strong, less valiant, less of a man than these able bodied seamen? Indeed, he would prove that he was not. Hence he drank the cheap whiskey like a man.

"They were men," argued the child. "They proved it by the way they drank. Drink was the badge of manhood. So I drank with them, drink by drink, raw and straight, though the cursed stuff couldn't compare with a stick of chewing taffy or a delectable 'cannonball.'"

Slowly but never wavering the child drank his hosts into a coma, thus discovering what a good stomach and strong head he had for intoxicants—"a bit of knowledge that was sure to be a source of pride in succeeding years, and that ultimately I was to come to consider a great affliction."

Next he bought a pirate oyster sloop, bought it with the savings of his nigger mammy, and chose this life to escape the drudgery of existence in the cannery where sometimes—even as a child—he worked thirty-six hours at a stretch, stopping only to have his meals.

His life after this is a rare picture of the devil-may-care freedom of the life of the sea, a parallel to the magnificent sea picture of "The Sea Wolf," yet distinctly individual to the story in hand, a story of thrill and adventure, of love and of travel, always with John Barleycorn well in the foreground, showing at every step how liquor is thrust upon, rather than sought, by Jack and how, eventually, the manhood of the man got the better of the beast.

Bosworth, Inc., the maker of the film, has brought out the details of the life with such distinctness, has pictured the author's portrayal of the effects of drink so strongly, that the liquor interests are said to have offered $25,000 to have the film suppressed, fearing that its effect in this fall's elections would be to turn California "dry."

Rejecting the offer, the producers are now putting it upon the market with the unanimous approval of the W. C. T. U. and the anti-saloon interests who feel, perhaps not without reason, that "John Barleycorn" offers the strongest moral argument against drink ever offered to the public in motion picture form.

To Reproduce Famous Bastile on Screen

The Bastile, one of the most famous prison-castles in history and the taking a razing of which marked the fall of the ancient French monarchy, has been reproduced at Universal City, Calif., to be used in a series of features written around the unique French character, Francois Villon, who rose from a vagabond poet to the post of personal advisor to King Louis XI. An exact replica of the ancient prison as far as record of it has been preserved, is now crouched in the foot-hills of the Sierra Nevada mountains—and it is over a hundred years since the structure was destroyed by revolutionists. Every school child has had his visions and nightmares of the Bastile and almost every litterateur has pictured its horrors so that the majority of book readers know that those who entered there left all hope behind. Thus, aside from an appealing and significant place in the series of feature pictures, it has an intense educational value. "The Bastile has fallen!"—this cry will last as long as history because its real meaning was "mankind has risen."

The first of the Francois Villon series is a three-reeler and is entitled, "The Romaunt of the Rose." The role of Francois Villon is being played by Murdock MacQuarrie, the great actor who created the part of Richelleu for the screen. The director is Charles Giblyn and such stars as Pauline Bush and Lon Chaney play important parts in the production.

The story is from the pen of George Bronson-Howard. It was written for the Century Magazine and is now running in serial form in that publication.

It is predicted by the experts at the West Coast Studios that this series will mark an epoch in the production of motion pictures as it is far from a mere parade of pageantry and splendor with a slender thread of a plot. On the contrary it will carry a plot of terrific strength and will be an authentic mirror of French life during the reign of Louis XI. Country streets and the thoroughfares of the romantic Paris which has passed into history, have been constructed on a massive scale to answer the demands of a dignified, studently and artistic production of this master piece of romantic literature.

Wife's Love Beats Swindlers

Timber Crooks Cornered

GRIPPING situations and realistic settings, together with natural acting on the part of all the principals makes Essanay's two part release of Friday, July 24, which is entitled "A Letter From Home," one of exceptional merit.

The story was adapted from the Munsey magazines and deals with a new theme, that of grafting in a timberland deal, in a masterful manner and as the story develops the interest grows steadily and the demand for action on the part of the players increases, but at all times they are equal to it.

The work of Richard C. Travers as the young state's attorney is excellent and he gives the character many little life touches which make it appear human at all times. Miss Gerda Holmes, playing opposite Mr. Travers, also does excellent work. In the scene where she discovers her husband is about to accept tainted money her emotional acting is worthy of especial mention as she registers every feeling perfectly. The others in the cast, Miss Helen Dunbar, Harry Dunkinson, John H. Cossar, William Robinson, Frank Dayton and Tommy Harper also give their various characters a great amount of life and action although one or two of the roles seem to be lacking in the "business" assigned to them.

The settings, which cover several stations in life are true and full of atmosphere at all times and while none are intended to be of the elaborate variety all are consistent with the positions of the characters whose abodes they represent. The atmosphere of the dreary life in the forest, far away from civilization is brought out with great strength.

The story opens with the appjointment of John Armory as special attorney for the state to investigate conditions in the timberland. For some time there had been a great amount of talk about grafting going on in this section of the state but the men behind the deals were so clever that at no time had they allowed their deals to be seen by the public. Armory is determined to run the crooked parties to earth and is glad to think he can begin at once. One thing bothers him, however. He has a little sweetheart named Ruth to whom he is devoted and he knows that when he leaves for the timberland it will separate him from her indefinitely, as his work will keep him busy continually and he will be unable to return to visit her until it is completed.

He determines to overcome the difficulty and when he tells Ruth of his appointment he also proposes and she accepts. They steal away and are married quietly and then go to a country club for a few days before leaving for the woods.

It happens that J. R. Zerkel, a timber king who is at the bottom of the entire swindling plan, is also at the club and through a friend he learns that Armory is the man who is to try to expose him. Sizing up the attorney, Zerkel determines that he can easily quiet him and after making Armory's acquaintance he offers him a tempting bribe to gloss over all conditions his inspection reveals.

Armory indignantly refuses the offer and tells Zerkel that every one of the guilty parties will pay dearly for their crooked work. The next day he leaves with his wife for the timber country where he at once starts work. Zerkel sees that it will be a fight to a finish but is certain that Armory can be won over so he determines to continue his efforts and raises the amount of the bribe a thousand dollars.

In the woods Armory plunges into his work, more determined than ever to run the criminals to ground, and his wife is practically neglected. Her lot is not a happy one for she has been accustomed to all the pleasures of gay city life and to be shut off from all the world, without anyone to even speak to during the day makes her terribly lonesome.

Armory, wrapped up in his work, never considers her side of the matter as he believes she is happy, but the realization of her suffering is brought home to him one day when he finds her diary, in which she has written the tale of her longings for the merry life she used to lead. A great struggle takes place within him for he feels it is his duty to remain until he has brought the swindlers to justice but at the same time he knows that his wife will have to suffer as long as he stays. His desire to see justice done is supreme however and he determines he will stay until his work is completed, though his determination appears rather weak on account of his worry over his wife's loneliness.

Zerkel has been carefully laying plans to get Armory into a position where he will be forced to leave the timberland and for this purpose has had Bently, a banker in the town near the woodland, keep in close touch with the attorney's home life. As soon as Bently learns of the unhappiness of Mrs. Armory he determines that the time to approach the attorney with the new offer is at hand. He goes to Armory with the bribe but fails, as Zerkel did on the first attempt. However he impresses Armory even more strongly with the belief that Ruth should not be forced to remain in the woods. He then leaves him, determined to let another of Zerkel's confederates try to get him to accept the bribe.

man, arrives in the little town under an assumed name. He at once proceeds to get acquainted with the attorney and learns many details of the struggle that is going on within the man. One day when he sees Armory more worried than usual he makes him the offer to leave the woods forever, also telling him how wrong it is to force his wife to remain in the lonely place. Armory this time does not refuse but asks a little time to think it over and tells Clutton to come to his home that evening for his answer. When he returns from work that evening his wife notices he acts strangely and when Clutton comes later she determines to play evesdropper, as she suspects that it may be an attempt to bribe her husband. She sees Armory weakly fall and accept the money, as he has decided that he can no longer force the woman he loves to remain in unhappiness.

Ruth sees her husband accept the bribe.

No sooner has Clutton left the house, however, than Ruth rushes to her husband and tells that she has seen all and begs him for her sake to return the money and punish the grafters, as she loves him enough to remain in the woods all her life. This settles the matter as Armory realizes the crookedness of the thing he was about to do and the next morning he goes to Clutton and returns the money, telling him that now he has all the evidence necessary to place him and the other swindlers behind the bars and that the bribe which was offered him is only one more link in the chain of evidence which he has secured.

The cast of characters is as follows:

John Armory, state's attorney.....Richard C. Travers
Ruth, his wife.....Gerda Holmes
Her mother .....Helen Dunbar
Zerkel, the timber king.....Harry Dunkinson
Clutton, his confidential man.....John H. Cossar
Phillip Bently, banker.....Wm. Robinson
Hotel proprietor .....Frank Dayton
Bellboy .....Tommy Harper

Another Film of Popular Series

Director Thomas Ricketts of the American Film Company has just completed another picture of the "In the Firelight" series, which have proved exceedingly popular. The title of this film is "At the End of a Perfect Day" and it is in two reels, as the other pictures have been. The release date is to be announced soon.

Settings Excel in American Drama

"A Man's Way"

THE settings, both interior and exterior, chosen by Director Ayres as a background for "A Man's Way," the two-reel feature to be released by the American Film Manufacturing Company on Monday, July 20, are about the best combination of the artistic and the appealing that have been seen on the screen for some time.

Henry in the home of the mountain girl.

They are not confined to one station in life or to any particular locality but cover a wide range and give us a glimpse of a college campus, the broad expanse of a California open country with the majestic mountains rising in the distance, the sitting and drawing rooms of several homes of society people, a bachelor's apartment and garden scenes in city homes which are of surpassing beauty. Most of the exteriors and one or two of the interiors found in this collection of charming scenery were taken on the estate of a California millionaire.

While without a doubt the setting stands out above all else in this picture there is a story told within it that by far surpasses many of the so-called "screen masterpieces" of today for it not only presents a different style of hero from that the public is used to but illustrates a little sidelight of life, the working of a man's ambition and love against each other.

Three characters, portrayed by William Garwood, Vivian Rich and Charlotte Burton, carry practically the entire story and each of the players has succeeded in making a real flesh and blood person of the role they interpret. Mr. Garwood maintains the same even plane in his acting throughout while Miss Rich excels in the early part of the story as the wild mountain girl, a character in which she has been seen before and in which she appears to revel. The emotional acting of Miss Burton toward the close of the picture is very appealing and without the least straining on her part it goes straight to the heart. Harry Von Meter in a character role so completely submerges his personality that it is next to impossible to recognize him.

Gladys refuses to forgive her husband.

The college days of Henry and Louise are the first thing shown in the story. The girl loves the boy devotedly but his one thought is career and while he considers her as his best pal he never once thinks of returning the love she feels for him. At the end of their school days they separate and he is hurried away by a bunch of his boy friends and has not even a chance to say good bye to her. She is sadly disappointed but it does not lessen her love for him in the least.

In his chosen work, that of a geologist, Henry rises quickly, devoting all of his time to it and hardly ever writing to the girl who loves him so dearly. When it becomes necessary to send a competent man into the mountains to work Henry is the one selected by his employer on account of the great rapidity with which he has advanced.

In the wilds of the mountains to which Henry goes, live Gladys and her father. She is a girl of nature and her singing is as sweet as that of the birds. Henry meets and takes an interest in both her and her father and when Gladys says she would like to read and write as he does he offers to be her teacher.

Day by day she studies under his direction and the love between them grows until at last he finds the first thing she has written—a message of love—and claims her as his own. His career is forgotten and they are married and settle down in the little cabin in the mountains, happy and content. In the east Louise longs for the love of the man she is beginning to realize will never be hers, and devotes her life to work among the poor.

For a while all is peace and contentment in the home of Harry and Gladys but slowly the man's ambition comes to the front again and he knows that the call of his work is becoming too strong for him to resist. His wife's devotion bothers him, especially when he studies, and one day, after a quarrel, he leaves her and returns to his work in the East.

In the days that follow Gladys grieves but never neglects her studies as she feels that Henry was ashamed of her and is more determined now than ever to learn all the nice mannerisms of the women of the class to which he belongs. Loneliness causes Louise's health to break and she is sent to the mountains where she finds Gladys warbling a love song with her sweet, wild voice. She knows that the mountain girl could be made into a marvelous singer and as soon as Louise is well she returns to the city, taking with her Gladys and her father and the girl of the wilds is placed under a famous vocal teacher.

Henry again devotes all his time to his work and slowly results begin to appear and he becomes recognized as an authority. Then he longs for his wife and returns to the mountains to claim her, only to find the cabin deserted.

Five long years follow during which Henry has kept up a continual search for Gladys without succes. He is now a master of his work but to him life is empty as he knows he has lost the only thing that he ever cared for. Gadys too has risen to success as a singer and Louise and she have grown to love each other, both knowing that the other had a sorrow but neither telling what it is.

One day a reception is given at which Gladys sings and this event brings together the man and wife and the other woman who has loved so long and faithfully. At first they do not meet but as Gladys' final number is finished she recognizes Henry. Hoping to avoid meeting him she hurries from the house but he sees her and rushes to her side. Although she has always loved him her pride now keeps her from going to his arms and sadly he withdraws, realizing his own unworthiness of her. Louise, standing in the window, with her heart bursting has seen the man she loves pleading with the other woman and determines to make him happy by sacrificing her last hope of ever winning him.

She goes to Gladys and confesses to her that the secret she has always kept was her love for Henry and asks the wife to take him back for her sake. Realizing the devotion of Louise, Gladys' heart softens and she promises the other woman that she will make Henry happy. Louise goes to the man as he is about to pass out of both of their lives forever and leads him back to Gladys and as they find happiness in each others arms she slips away, unnoticed, her undying love proven.

The cast is as follows:

Henry, the loved one.....William Garwood
Louise, the one who loves.....Charlotte Burton
Gladys, the one he loves.....Vivian Rich
Her Grandfather .....Harry Von Meter
Louise's Mother .....Louise Lester
Dr. Flemming .....Jack Richardson

Vitagraph Plant Enlarged

The new four story building, an addition to the already extensive Vitagraph Company's plant, is now in course of construction on the north side of the square block now occupied by the laboratory and studios. This building will entirely cover the block and is intended for the occupancy of the mechanical departments. The building on the south side of the square will be remodeled for executive offices. The erection of this immense factory will give the Vitagraph Company one of the largest and most complete plants in the world. It will be built of cement block, and equipped with the latest and most improved machinery.

Essanay Star Scores in Denver

Miss Ruth Stonehouse, star of the Essanay Company, who appeared in many extraordinary dances, was the chief attraction at the opening of the new theater de luxe The Plaza in Denver, her home city, last week. Miss Stonehouse's appearance created no little stir inasmuch as it was the first personal appearance of a screen star in dramatic work in that city and the signal honor of having the charming artiste return to the city of her birth to launch the new theater was greatly appreciated by the screen fans.

Miss Stonehouse arrived in Denver on the afternoon of her opening day and was met by hundreds of her admirers and former friends who welcomed her triumphant return to the city of her birth. The newspapers pictured her arrival and were generous in their praise of the exquisite charm of her personality and of her superb dancing.

In appreciation of her splendid welcome and in honor of her home state, Miss Stonehouse presented on CLEO MADISON came to the Universal last year after a strenuous season on the road starring and directing the productions of her own stock company. She decided to take a vacation. She had not rested for so long that she found that she had forgotten how to do it and when she presented herself at the Universal Pacific coast studios one of the directors told her she was just the type needed for an important role under consideration. Miss Madison played it and has been playing leading roles ever since for the Universal. There is great force in her acting and she has remarkable powers of characterization. Her long experience in stock is now bringing her compound interest. Miss Madison comes from Chicago. At present she is being starred in the big feature production "Trey o' Hearts," which will succeed "Lucille Love."

KING BAGGOT, one of the most popular of motion picture actors who appears in dramatic productions of the Imp company, is a peer in his profession. Playing leading roles in hundreds of pictures, and photographed in the character of a millionaire, pauper, philanthropist, miser, minister, crook, nonogenarian and youth, his appearance in a picture immediately labels it as one of quality in the estimation of the public. King Baggot was born on November 7, 1879, in St. Louis, Mo. His education was directed along lines entirely foreign to his ultimate profession. Despite his father's protests against his desertion of the real estate business, Baggot turned toward the stage and played at Moener's Garden in St. Louis throughout one summer. His first visit to New York City was as a member of the cast in "The Queen of the Highway."

MURDOCK MACQUARRIE, leading man of the Nestor brand productions of Director Charles Giblon, first displayed his art to the motion picture camera fourteen years ago and since that time he has played leading parts in more than five hundred pictures. One glance at Mr. MacQuarrie and it will be seen why he has attained success and why he has been chosen to play leading role in the Universal's screen adaption of George Bronson Howard's "Villon" stories, soon to be released. Two qualities, above all others, compel interest in this actor. They are the power in his personality and face which makes possible the many virile characterizations he essays, and decision in his acting. He is never at a loss to know exactly what business will be psychologically true to the situation in which he finds himself. He lives the parts that he plays and feels the sorrows and joys.

FLORENCE LAWRENCE'S professional career is almost too familiar to need repeating. Those who follow the screen know that her first hit was with the Vitagraph Company when the pictures were quite young. Then she came over to the Imp company, where she played opposite King Baggot and later she moved to Lubin in Philadelphia, with Arthur Johnson opposite. Later she came back to the independents, playing under the Victor brand. Then owing to ill health, principally, she retired from the screen to her farm out in New Jersey. The whole motion picture world rose up as one person with a demand that she return. And she returned. Today she stands as the wealthiest girl in the film game. She is now a Universal star, and incidentally she is said to be drawing down the biggest salary of any actress on the screen.

Quick Advance of Feature Company

Warner's Program Prospers

PERHAPS no other word is more abused and misused than the term "feature," as applied to motion pictures. A production in three reels may or may not be a feature; indeed, in the majority of cases the name is a misnomer. The real feature film is a combination of punch, story, good direction, clever acting, perfect photography, originality, exciting situations, the unusual and the spectacular, and, in general, all things of superior merit which through their own appeal draw the spectator to them and which lift the film above the average and make it a feature in the true sense of the word, fit to compete with "the legitimate" on any stage in the world.

The accounting department in Warners' Features offices, a perfect hive of industry.

The above study of what a feature film really is was the first thing which confronted a number of prominent film men early in August, 1913, when they met in conference in New York City to perfect an organization which would operate along new and novel lines, supplying exhibitors with the pick of feature films and which would assist materially in the advancement of the motion picture industry.

The trade heard of the meeting and exhibitors in all parts of the country began to realize that it was the birth of a new idea in filmdom and with the organization of the Warner's Features Inc., of which P. A. Powers was elected president, one of the great needs of the film industry was supplied.

Buying from the open market and accepting for distribution only the films which they knew would prove of great value to the exhibitors, the Warner Feature Program established a large following the week it made its first release and may be truly said that it has never once altered its output of high grade material since that time. The companies of recognized ability who became regular contributors to this program employed directors of the highest grade, recognized stars of the screen, supporting players capable of handling their roles in a manner which showed a complete knowledge of their art and cameramen able to get results which brought out every picture clear and artistically.

It was little wonder then that countless exhibitors who tried the plan showered letters of appreciation upon the new company and many more showmen who viewed the picture at various times at once secured the weekly program for their own theaters. As the policy of the company was to give service to only one exhibitor in each town or district many were quick to recognize what it would mean to them, and soon the business end of the company became so large that it was necessary to secure new quarters, and, in October, 1913, the offices were moved to the eighth floor of the Leavitt building, 130 West Forty-sixth street, New York City, where the photographs for these illustrations were taken.

Having established many friends and regular purchasers among the exhibitors throughout the country, the company now proceeded to supply them with lobby and poster displays which also proved exingly popular. After that came the establishing of many exchanges throughout the United States and Canada as well as a branch office across the ocean. All of these offices are ideally located. The New England states and the East are taken care of by the branches located in Boston, Syracuse, Buffalo, New York City, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Wilkes-Barre, Washington, D. C., and Wheeling, W. Va. The southern exhibitors receive their service from Atlanta, Dallas, New Orleans and Louisville. The middle West is served by Cleveland, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Minneapolis and Detroit. Exhibitors in the far west look to Denver, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Seattle for their service. Canada is handled via Toronto and Montreal.

As each of these cities has excellent shipping facilities, prompt deliveries of the films is assured at all times.

It is now eleven months since the organization of the Warner's Features Inc., and during all this time the entire organization, embracing 23 branch offices, has earnestly endeavored to live up to its slogan, "quality first—service always." Hundreds of multiple reel pictures have been examined upon the screen and rejected as lacking that quality necessary to insure a continuation of the reputation earned by the earlier releases.

At the present time this corporation is receiving pictures at regular intervals from the following companies: Gene Gauntier Feature Players; Sid Olcott International Players; Marion Leonard Film Company; Colorado Motion Picture Company; Albuquerque Film Manufacturing Company; Milano Film Company; Miller Brothers, 101 Ranch Features; Ambrosio American Company; Pyramid Film Company; Paris-Eclair; Balboa Amusement Company; J. Parker Read and Mittenthal Brothers Film Company.

Among the noted directors whose names have appeared on the pictures released through Warner's Program are Sidney Olcott, Stanner E. V. Taylor, Marshall Farnum, Jack J. Clark, H. C. Matthews, J. Farrell MacDonald, Otis B. Thayer, Frank Beal, G. P. Hamilton and several foreign directors of note.

The office of the company in New York City is a model of its kind and the views on another page give an idea of the manner in which they are equipped. The New York exchange is also a subject of interest to many exhibitors and in next week's issue of MOTOGRAPHY several views of the interior of that office will appear.

Edison Field Day

Surrounded by many of the actors and actresses who have helped to make the brand of pictures which bear his name famous, Thomas A. Edison on June 25 assisted in the celebration of "Edison Field Day" at Olympic Park, Irvington, N. J., which was given for the benefit of all of those who work under the renowned inventor.

Mr. Edison showed a keen interest in all the sports and opened the baseball throwing event by pitching the first ball. Actors, actresses and directors mingled with the hundreds who handle the business end of the great plant and competed with them in the various events, and during every moment of the time spent at the outing good feeling was evident on all sides.

It is estimated that about 2,500 people were present, the motion picture studio being represented by such stars as Miriam Nesbitt, Marc MacDermott, William West, Richard Neil, Elsie McLeod, Harry Eltinge, Yale Boss, Agustus Phillips, Mrs. William Bechtel, Julian Reed, Mrs. C. Jay Williams, Herbert Prior, Mabel Trunnelle, Cora Williams, Kathleen Coughlin, May Abbey, Harry Gripp, Frank A. Lyon, Edwin Clerk, Jessie Stevens, Mathilde Baring, Nellie Grant and Saul E. Harrison. Miss Elsie McLeod took second place in the 65 yard dash for ladies, much to the delight of the crowd.

One of the biggest features of the day was the race between C. H. Wilson, vice president and general manager of the Edison interests, and William Maxwell, second vice president, for a purse of $500. Three heats were required to decide the winner, Mr. Wilson returning victor.

To Feature Famous Baseball Star

After considerable effort on the part of the Universal Film Company the signature of Christy Matthewson, star pitcher of the New York Giants, and probably one of the best known stars in baseball, has been secured for a contract calling for him to appear exclusively in films produced by that company for the coming year.

These pictures will be released as a series at the rate of one two-reeler every month, and will have genuine plots behind them, which are now being prepared by the scenario department of that company. The players to support Mr. Matthewson have not been selected, but the Imp studio will be used in filming all the interior scenes. Most of the exteriors will be taken on the baseball grounds, and will show how the star handles himself while on the diamond.

Injuction Refused in "Cabiria" Suit

By a decision of Justice Greenbaum of the Supreme Court during a special term in New York County, Morris Brodkin was, on July 1, denied an injunction to prohibit the exhibition of "Cabiria" in the state of New York and in northern New Jersey. Harry R. Raver, Carlo Sciamengo and the Itala Film Company were the defendants and were represented by Attorneys Graham and Stevenson. The attorney for the plaintiff was Louis Verner.

By the Goat Man

JUST as truly as dog-days are coming, we are beginning to feel the "season" in motion pictures. Manufacturers have been reluctant in showing that the season is recognized or has any influence upon the kind of productions that are presented during hot weather. Cropping out here and there, my mail tells all too plainly that hot-weather rules are governing the marketing of various films. September 1—the opening of the legitimate theater—becomes the date of renewed activity on the part of all film-makers. The cream of the studio—those films which take rank in excellence over the every-day output are withheld for the magic later date. The season is on at its full pace with the cooler days.

* * *

Vacation time has its call upon all humanity. The actor-folk want to hike into the wooded hills and find recreation beyond the shout of the producer. The executives themselves are only human and find the call of the wild strong enough to heed. Fishing, yachting, hunting in the north woods—pleasures long-ago abandoned to the demands of business building—finds a delighted coterie of gentlemen eager to respond. These pleasures are in a large measure responsible for the draggy program of mid-summer. While the motion picture theater will continue to be an all-the-year-around enterprise, it will show a decided falling off in receipts not all due to the inclination of the local patron to spend his week ends out of town. The films themselves will show that there are other elements to be considered.

By no process can the summer-time effect upon film manufacture be overcome unless the films are made sufficiently far in advance to close down entirely over the ninety-day warm weather period. I fancy something of the kind will eventually be accepted. Then the studios will be turned over to the janitors and the animal keepers and the film stars will bask at the seashore in idleness. It will be a gay life!

In the meantime film manufacturers are becoming more favorably imbued with the idea that it pays to advertise direct to the consumer. The consumer is the film exhibitor right across the film exchange counter. I used to think he was an impossible proposition. I have seen the great horde of alleged exhibitors at the film exchanges and discounting their intelligence, I wondered when, if ever, they read anything. They were not the exhibitors at all. Some of them couldn't read anything! They were of the city mob who are sent to the exchange for today's run. The city program in many theaters has no immediate concern for the film manufacturer. It has taken me full five years to figure that out! (More evidence that I learn slowly but surely.) But I'm right in the matter, and that counts for something. I would rather have one big exhibitor as a regular home reader of MOTOGRAPHY than a thousand near-exhibitors who use junk films. I would prefer one Furniss, one Brylawski, one Levine, one Saxe, one Loew, one Rothapfel, one Ray or any one of two hundred more that I can name than any five hundred operators of projection machines. Sam Rothapfel can actually make a film over night—make it demand the first big money. He is the sort of ultimate consumer I want for my advertisers. The film manufacturer wants his money back as quickly as he can get it. He gets it from the first-run exhibitors of this country. They are the men who know the big films by the unbiased reviews they read in the trade journals. The ultimate consumer is a live, known quantity. The courting of this element is one of the film makers ambitions. What the filmmaker can do to help this live element is another of the problems not yet solved. Going over the heads of these quick cash customers is all in the interest of getting back the money in the short st possible time. It puts several angles on advertising that isn't encountered in other industries. The advertising of films requires the big thoughts of big men. How to get the money out of a mechanical contrivance or a household necessity is one problem. To get the money out of a film is something else again. The secret of a film lies in its enduring qualities right off the bat. Your money back in a hurry means that the maker's interest goes right on and on, but the quick, satisfying turn over must come from those live-wire big exhibitors who go in for the first-run program stuff and the known features of merit. MOTOGRAPHY'S prized clientele buys everything first run and the features worthy that name. We feel better now that we are on speaking terms with this tremendous purchasing power. Those advertisers who feel they can get along without us had best reckon how much better they might get along with us.

We are now rendering a genuine advertising service. There have been times when we might have done something of the sort without knowing it. It is better all around when we know. The New York manufacturer who would use our helpful service, may call Bryant 7030. The Chicago manufacturer is thoroughly familiar with the service we render. Those outlying suburbs on the Pacific coast will please resort to the mails. Special attention given all mail orders. But at all events, remember that the "highbrow" film journal de luxe, meaning nothing more than the book in your hands, is rendering a one hundred cents on the dollar advertising service, reaching all the trade, and thousands of the laity who simply can't resist buying the magazine because of its excellent presentation of an active and magical industry.

An unsigned postcard comes to me from Montreal—showing St. Gabriel and St. Charles churches—saying, "You bet they read MOTOGRAPHY here." I'm at a loss to know whether this means the city or the churches. At any rate, the dope says they're reading MOTOGRAPHY and I've suspected it right along. Looking over my in-and-out sheets, Charley Stark being out, I fancy he sent the card.

I am writing ahead of the Dayton convention. It will always be a crazy occupation to attempt current subjects in a publication that is predated ten days. The convention is scheduled for July 6 to 13. This tabloid of truth is dated July 18th. It should know all about what happens at Dayton right up to the close of July 13, but you can't be eight or ten places at once and I have to be at Dayton where I expect to find my one great and lasting disappointment. For I cannot believe M. A. Neff will die without a fight and I expect to see him defeated for the presidency of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League—the job he was joyously given in the year of one, reluctantly surrendered to him a year later; bitterly won in the year three. M. A. Neff's goose is to be cooked at Dayton. I would be worse than no prognosticator if I failed to set it down here. Should he succeed himself it would be literally that. Ohio, his home state, is through with him. Delegations that he has kidded himself into the belief he owns are dead against him. His entire executive body has begged him to withdraw as a candidate to succeed himself.

But Neff is dead set in his ways. He believes in Neff particularly. I get visions of his arbitrary tactics when I want diversion. Leaning across the speaker's bench, his eyes shining, his firm jaw, his long legs in a tension to spring, and clenched in his right fist the gavel that is wielded according to the Neff book of rules. He will always be like that. Whether it is due to an earlier training or his disdain for the intelligence of his fellows, it doesn't matter. Neff has pulled the stuff for four years and that ought to be enough.

A Pioneer of Filmdom

George Kleine, who startled followers of the screen by bringing "Quo Vadis," the first big feature production, into this country, is one of the real pioneers of the film game. In the early days when the penny arcade, the Latham Loop and Thomas Edison were just beginning to be heard of by the public and when the things which were to prove the foundations of the present day motion picture industry were in their infancy, Mr. Kleine was interested in the business.

George Kleine.

He was then engaged in selling stereopticon machines, magic lantern lenses and many other little things which, later, led directly to his handling the moving picture strips of fifty feet, with frames about four inches wide. From the very outset of this new industry Mr. Kleine gave it much of his time and attention, being responsible for the adaption of the carbon arc to the pictures as a means of illumination. Without this arc there would probably be no pictures today. Not satisfied with the glory of that achievement, he became interested in the producing and selling end of the business and, in short, in every phase of motion picture making, handling and exhibiting.

All branches of the industry bear the imprint of his personality. In turn he has been a manufacturer, the manager of a number of film exchanges, a film importer of world-wide reputation, part owner of the new "Chandler," one of New York's finest picture houses, and today is actively engaged in making pictures in his own studios abroad. From April 1910, to May 1913, Mr. Kleine was vice president of the General Film Company, but was forced to resign from this position because of the many other duties which crowded upon him.

He is soon to begin a series of American-made productions which will undoubtedly rival in excellence some of the splendid foreign pictures he has brought to this country and which are largely responsible for the present popularity of the big feature films.

Eclectic's Odd Mystery Film

A three reel detective comedy-drama is to be released on July 20 by the Eclectic Film Company, entitled "The Phantom Thief."

It differs from other comedy-dramas in that the comedy is not embodied in the situations or incidents, but only in the exaggeration of the eccentricities which people who devote all their time and energy to one subject are said to possess. In this case it is the queer facial expressions and singular actions of the detective, while solving the puzzle of a series of mysterious thefts, that furnish the merriment.

While amused at the queer antics of the sleuth and the lightning-like changes which his face undergoes, one does not for a minute lose interest in the mystery in the story. At times when the solution seems at hand, and circumstances point clearly towards the guilt of some person, the theories fail and the mystery becomes deeper than ever, until in the last reel the final solving of the mystery makes former conjectures as to the identity of the thief, seem foolish.

Detective Nick Winter's attention is called to a clueless theft committed at the home of George Warner. A pearl necklace had disappeared from his desk, and his secretary, who was the only occupant of the room at the time, earnestly denies any knowledge of its whereabouts, nor could it be found on his person. Mr. Warner orders Bouchet's arrest on suspicion, and hires another secretary, who turns out to be none other than the detective, who has secured the position in order to be able to read Warner's confidential correspondence. In the waste-basket he finds two letters, either of which would have been sufficient motive for Warner's effecting his own robbery, but later events prove this theory ridiculous.

Scene from Eclectic's "The Phantom Thief."

The mystery becomes deeper when it is learned that a nearby grocer's articles have contained stolen property, Warner, himself, having recovered his necklace in a chicken purchased at the store.

The detective finds a monkey is the real culprit in Eclectic's "The Phantom Thief."

Several incidents add a weird, uncanny touch to the story, one of which is the disappearance of Winter's coat and hat when he has descended a well in an adjoining yard in search of a clue. On returning to Warner's office he finds the missing articles lying on a chair.

The suspicion creeps into Winter's mind that a monkey is the only earthly thing that could have committed these thefts; he lays his plans accordingly. Following the line of approach and entrance which would be best adapted to a monkey's mode of traveling, he finds himself in the home of a foreigner, who, upon being questioned, informs Winter that he is the possessor of a monkey but that his pet has just escaped, and points out the direction taken by it. Winter follows and finds himself in view of the grocery store which had before been under suspicion. Entering, he sees the monkey perched on the counter perfectly contented with the delicacies the store has to offer.

First Release of Child Player

The "Kids of the Movies" have bowed themselves into the film circle in a two-part offering of that name. The initial showing of the screen play convinced those who saw it, that there is personality to each of the players and furthermore, that each of them represents a distinctly different type. The kiddies are banded together under the guidance of the Child Players Company of America, Inc., of which Martin P. Korn is the president, Louis Robert Korn the director-general, and A. Brodie, the director.

Kathie Fischer Stars in Beauty Film

Little Kathie Fischer is to be featured in "Her 'Really' Mother," which will be released by the Beauty Company on July 21. As a little girl, repelled by her disinterested natural mother, she steals away to an unknown neighbor in search of a "real" mother. The story carries a deep pathos and will prove an object lesson to those who through neglect have been permitting the yearning hearts of the little ones to go begging for love. Little Kathie acts her part in a very natural and convincing manner.

A NEW LEAGUE ADMINISTRATION.

UNDER the circumstances, the election of a new set of officers by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America in convention at Dayton, on Wednesday, July 8, was the most hopeful thing that has happened in organized motion picture circles for a long time. As reported elsewhere, the new League officers are Marion S. Pearce, president; T. P. Finnegan, first vice-president; Mark E. Cory, second vice-president; W. R. Wilson, secretary, and Peter J. Jeup, treasurer.

President Pearce has already stated his position on matters of immediate interest to exhibitors. One of the resolutions proposed by the amalgamation committee made opposition to censorship the vital factor in any possible combination of the two organizations now in the field. The censorship plank in Mr. Pearce's platform he laid down early in the sessions:

"Official censorship is an injury to business and detrimental to the interests of the picture men. The National Board of Censorship, which is voluntary, is performing this service to the satisfaction of picture men and theater-goers, and as a consequence pictures are getting better and will continue to do so."

It may be a little early to draw conclusions, but apparently the election has removed the greatest, possibly the only, obstacle to amalgamation of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and the International Motion Picture Association. With the two bodies of picture men now agreed on all important subjects, their separation is more obviously absurd than ever. The problem of uniting them will undoubtedly receive the immediate consideration of the new League administration, and we are sure the officers and directors of both associations will allow no mere technicality or small difference to stand in the way.

The election is a decided victory for the progressive element of the League, and an auspicious circumstance for the members of the I. M. P. A. and even for those exhibitors who are members of neither. For it must not be forgotten that these non-members are the vast majority. We hope before long to see the combined League and Association, under one name and one set of officers, reduce that majority to a small minority. There must be but one association, and every exhibitor worthy the name must be a member of it, before the guiding hands and leading spirits of organization can feel satisfied.

SO LONG AS BOOKS SHALL LIVE.

ONE great maker of films has said that he placed more value in his library of books than in his collection of special properties. For the properties in themselves are but the tools of his work; but the books are a perpetual source of inspiration, the raw material for countless productions.

Out of books have come many of the best and most favored of plays. Every book is a scenario; and it matters not that the people may read before they see. For the reading but whets their appetite for the seeing. Dead type must ever be less attractive and less powerful than living pictures.

The supply of original photoplay scenarios that are really worth while is scanty. So is the supply of play manuscript for the legitimate. But good books are as the sands of the sea, and the staged drama never hesitates to adopt and adapt them to its needs.

And already the photoplay has proved the wisdom of a similar course.

Today there are stories appearing in type in hundreds of newspapers and on the screens of hundreds of picture theaters simultaneously. In this the theaters have the best of it. For those who read first are impelled to see; but those who see first can get along without reading. So we prove our contention that typed fiction is a natural parent of filmed fiction.

Why demand that all photoplay plots be original? If the plot of the printed story is new, then it is still new as a photoplay; and the photoplay adaptation is the noblest use of type.

Of making many books there is no end, says the Old Testament; and today the mills of our printing presses grind out over a hundred thousand volumes a year. Very few of them remain unread. Thousands upon thousands of them are read with joy and inspiration by thousands upon thousands of readers. Here then is material for all the photoplays of a nation.

No good story, however well it is written, however widely its typed pages are circulated, has completed its usefulness until it has become a photoplay. And in the filming, the book has done no favor to the film; rather the film completes and perpetuates the book.

THEATER LIGHTING.

PICTURE theater design and equipment have become an art only within the last few years—or months, one might almost say. The dignity of the films themselves has become so exalted in that time that the most elaborately fitted houses are none too fine for their exhibition.

Architectural design is, of course, an important influence in the refinement of the picture theater. But probably no other single element is so responsible for the new attractiveness as the judicious use of electric lighting.

Any theater, or other place of amusement for that matter, is essentially an after-dark affair. Its exterior, or front, must therefore be so illuminated that people will have their attention drawn to it even when their minds may be occupied with other things. In this endeavor the theater may be in competition with a number of other lines of business which have discovered the attractiveness of light. The local dry goods store, the ice cream parlor, the cigar store, if their managers are enterprising, all illuminate their fronts.

Every normal human being is attracted by light. The affinity is nearly as great as that of the moth and the flame. The lightest spot on the street always draws the greatest crowds; and crowds are what the picture theater man wants. His only hope of getting them is to make his front the brightest and best illuminated of any.

Even in the earlier days it was customary to outline the front, the entrance, exit, etc., with incandescent lamps spaced about a foot apart. Even small lamps used in this way make quite a showing, especially if aided by an electric sign. Such a sign need not necessarily be a "flasher," although that variety has its advantages. If no sign is used lamps as large as twenty-five-watt may be be used for outlining; and the extra current consumed will be found well warranted by the brilliancy and attractiveness obtained.

Just as an example, an exceptionally well lighted theater in Seattle uses such an array of lamps, and has in addition 24 hundred-watt lamps under the marquise and four 750-watt gas-filled lamps (the successors of the flaming arc) in the entrance.

The indirect system of lighting, now coming into such general use in offices, stores and dwellings, is really ideal for picture theater use because it permits of sufficient illumination to see one's way about the theater while the pictures are being projected. Indirect lighting is, indeed, largely responsible for the fact that there are no dark picture theaters now.

The Seattle theater mentioned above uses all indirect lighting, the light coming from behind lattices on the side walls and through a large leaded glass ceiling—a sort of artificial sky-light of amber glass. Six 750-watt lamps are placed above this glass, while behind the side lattices are twenty-five and fifteen-watt lamps on twelve and 24 inch centers. The "sky-light" and upper lattice are illuminated only during intermissions. The lower lattice, with fifteen-watt lamps, is left lighted all the time.

There is nothing unusual, or at least nothing difficult, in the lighting arrangement of this theater, and it is mentioned only because it is easier to describe a specific case than to lay out a hypothetical arrangement. The point to be emphasized is that plenty of illumination is the best kind of investment. Outside the house, it is bound to draw the crowds and invite them in. Inside, it makes the intermissions pass quickly and cheerfully and keeps the audience orderly and quiet during the exhibition. And it effectually silences one of the earliest and most forceful arguments of the so-called reform element.

GOOD PATHE EDUCATIONAL

On one of Pathe's split-reel educational pictures soon to be released, is a tiger hunt in Indo-China showing the hunter and his assistants trailing a tiger; then comes the discovery of the prey and the chase, and finally the skinning of the dead beast which the natives regard as a pest. "Ice and Snow" completes the reel, illustrating the different effects of chemicals on water and its many peculiarities after being frozen. Another split-reel educational called "The Heart, and Circulation of the Blood," shows the hearts of different animals working, though separated from the bodies, the blood coursing through the arteries, and the magnified corpuscles of the blood of several different kinds of animals.

"Modes of Travel in Japan," completes the reel and demonstrates the numerous ways in which the small, agile people of that country overcome natural difficulties in transportation.

COMING—"THE FORTUNE HUNTER"

The latest masterpiece of the Lubin Company is a picturized version of Winchell Smith's "The Fortune Hunter" with Ethel Clayton, the charming Lubin actress, and William Elliot, late of the Belasco forces, in the leading roles. This elaborate photoplay, in which over three hundred people will appear, will be presented in five reels of two hundred scenes. It is being staged by Barry O'Neil who produced "The Third Degree," "The Lion and the Mouse" and "The Wolf." "The Fortune Hunter" was adapted for picturization by Clay M. Greene and Barry O'Neil. The cast includes Joseph Kaufman, Geo. Soule Spencer, Chas. Brandt, Gaston Bell, Alan Quinn, Rosetta Brice, Mrs. Geo. W. Walters, Ruth Bryan, Ferdinand Tidmarsh and Bennie of Lubinville.

Another Famous Players Success

IT IS the kind of play that will attract everybody, first because of the popularity of Mary Pickford and then because everybody who has seen it will tell those who haven't, what a perfectly charming play it is. For it contains all the elements that go toward making it just this, a charming play, and it gives to the world's Mary,—who particularly is the Famous Players' Mary—opportunity for much dramatic action. There is, perhaps, a greater call for the romantic in this picture than in any other of the pictures to which the charm of Mary Pickford has lent itself. And, as also is typical of "a Mary picture," there is satisfying humor throughout the play's five reels; and it is all put there by Mary herself.

The strong and splendid work of James Kirkwood, who plays opposite the pretty star, aids in setting the role of the latter off to especial advantage. For Kirkwood as Lancer Morne, the mountain giant, is all the Mary was not. But as for goodness of heart and character, the giant of the mountain is a man of the type that men like and women love. He is a dutiful son, a brave outlaw and a masterful lover.

"If you were a bird caught by an eagle, you would know it was no use to struggle!"

The Pickford-Kirkwood combine is a strong one, perhaps the strongest and most likeable that the world of picture-goers has seen in a considerable while. And it is one that this world hopes to see again.

"The Eagle's Mate" was filmed from the novel by Anna Alice Chapin. And one who knows how, wrote the scenario. The direction is by James Kirkwood himself and is one of the many fine points that make for the picture's unqualified success. There are many instances of the exceptional in the photography of the five reels and all of the cast do splendid work. The scenic offering accounts for a considerable share of the general fineness of the picture which, altogether, is one that cannot help but please even so great a variety of likes as is offered by the world of film goers.

Ida Waterman upholds her reputation for character work in her characterization of Sally Breckenridge, who, one of the tribe of Mornes, has defied her father and brothers by marrying into the rival house of Breckenridge. And from that day, her name is never mentioned in her father's house. Robert Broderick is the typical mountaineer, in the character of Sally's father, Abner Morne, while the part of Fisher Morne, the black sheep of the family, is well taken by Harry C. Browne. Helen Gillmore does good character work as Hagar Morne, sister of Sally and mother of Lancer Morne, the young mountaineer, who, though he has had several years at school in the east, is still in manner and sympathy, a mountaineer. Russell Bassett makes an amiable and mild Rev. Hotchkiss and R. J. Henry is a mountaineer who looks and acts worthy of the part.

"I've fought for you and now you're mine!"

Fisher Morne tries to fasten his guilt upon Anemone.

The music, which accompanied the showing of this Famous Player picture at the Strand theater during the past week, was especially fine; its every cadence was appropos to the particular scene it accompanied and Manager S. L. Rothapfel gave the orchestra his personal direction.

The "Eagle," in the story, is Lancer Morne (James Kirkwood) and Anemone Breckenridge, Anemone confronts the fierce mountaineers.

(Mary Pickford) after much protest to the contrary, becomes the eagle's mate. She is new to the mountains, its usages and its people and when, meeting Lancer Morne for the first time, he tells her that some day he is coming for her and that were she a little bird she would know it would be useless to fight against the strength of the eagle, she regards him as audacious and ignores him.

Then, the Mornes rise in a lawless revolt and Fisher Morne is injured. Because she is a Morne, Sally Breckenridge, Anemone's aunt, is prevailed upon to open her house to the lawless band and their injured burden, and she and Anemone nurse him back to health. Fisher becomes infatuated with Anemone to her distaste and when he leaves, promises she has not seen the last of him. He returns and kidnaps her, as she is wading in a stream, and she is carried off to the cabin of the Mornes'. Fisher proposes a toast to the girl but Lancer, entering and answering Anemone's appeal for protection, refuses to drink it and challenges Fisher to fight. Anemone interposes "It is no use for you to fight, for I wouldn't marry either of you." The men fight, however, and it is a fight to be remembered by those who see it. Lancer is triumphant and Anemone is left to do as she pleases in the days that follow. And many times, in those, days, Lancer asks her to marry him.

One day, the Rev. Hotchkiss appears with an offer of $35,000 ransom from Anemone's aunt, for the girl's safe return. Rather than allow her aunt to make this sacrifice of all the money she owns, Anemone marries Lancer. That night Fisher tries to kidnap the girl and return her for the sake of the ransom. Lancer hears her cries for help and rushes to her rescue, only to be shot down by Fisher who blames the deed upon Anemone and escapes. The following day Lancer insists upon Anemone's returning to her aunt's home. But en route she sees Fisher leading a rival band of feudists upon the people of his own clan, and she turns her horse and flies back to warn the Mornes of their danger. This act reinstates her in the favor of the clan and of her own accord she stays to care for the husband, whom she now realizes has at last awakened her dormant love.

There are various other little threads, pathetic and humerous, interwoven throughout the story that makes it one of the best five reels of film offered to the public.

At Work on Big Series

The Wilfred Lucas company of the Universal left this week for Big Bear Valley, on the top of the Sierra Madre mountains in California, where the crowning scenes of the first installment of the "Trey o' Hearts" series will be produced. The first installment of this series is entitled "Flower o' the Flame," a three-reeler calling for timberland settings and a forest fire.

The "Trey o' Hearts" series was written by Louis Joseph Vance and will appear in installment form in numerous newspapers throughout the United States. The stellar role in this big series is being played by Cleo Madison. Others of the company who made the trip are George Larkin, Edward Sloeman and Ray Hanford. They will remain about a week.

Abrams Starts Tour of States

Charles Abrams, accompanied by little Louis Goldstein, the 17-year-old salesman, left New York last week on a five weeks' trip which will carry him into practically every state in the Union. He has a trunk load of films with him, including subjects of the Great Northern Special, Great Northern Preferred and Film Releases of America.

Gee! How They Shivered

The accompanying photograph shows a cold day at the Lasky studio, Hollywood, Calif., when the inclemency of the weather prevented the various workers from engaging in work on hand. The group below from right to left shows Robert Edeson, who is appearing in "The Call of the North"; Stewart Edward White, author of that play; Dustin Farnum, star of "The Virginian"; Max Figman, who plays in "The Man on the Box" for Lasky; James Neil, heavy man of the Lasky company; Theodore Roberts, character man in "The Call of the North"; Thomas W. Ross, who played the leading role in "The Only Son" and Oscar Apfel, chief director of the concern, with Cecil

B. DeMille, director general, in the centre. In addition to the stars shown in the picture, H. B. Warner, Rita Standwood, and Chas. Richman are also at the Lasky studios.

Completes Thrilling Railroad Drama

Edison Stages Wreck

A THRILLING race between an auto and a train caps the climax in Edison's two part drama entitled "The President's Special" which will be released on August 7. While the race is on between a well-filled picnic train and Gertrude McCoy as Mrs. Farley at the wheel of her machine, cut backs show Charles Ogle, (Farley the switchman) seeing a vision of the accident for which he will be held responsible, the smashed coaches and dead victims, the spiritual bodies rising from the inanimate forms and approaching him accusing him of neglect of duty.

The wreckage which is used in the vision represents as much work and expense, probably, as all the rest of the scenes together. In order to get a wreck that would never be mistaken for anything else, the Edison people arranged with a railroad in Farmingdale, Long Island, to use four or five wooden coaches in a rear end collision. The result is one of the most realistic wrecks that has been used in pictures. The two coaches in the center are about half buried in each other.

The thrilling and sensational wreck scene in Edison's "The President's Special."

The scenes, many of which are both interiors and exteriors, offer unusual opportunities for clever photography, which is of the best.

John Farley's assignment as switchman necessitated his walking a long distance to work. Mrs. Farley reads of an auto which can be bought reasonably, purchases it, and surprises her husband on his return from work. Thereafter John Farley rides to and from his switch shanty. One night, Jim Flood, who relieves Farley from duty, is taken ill and Farley takes the night shift.

An order comes through from headquarters to sidetrack everything to make way for the president's special. Mrs. Farley arrives just as the order is received and, reading it, admonishes him to be sure to sidetrack 19, which is a picnic train.

Farley falls asleep and is awakened to his duty by the passing of the picnic train. Too late to prevent the accident which is sure to follow, Farley is nearly crazed by the thought of the trainload of children being rushed into a horrible smash-up by his neglect of duty.

As Number 19 passes the Farley home, the switchman's wife remembers the order. Her only chance of stopping it is to catch up with it at the next crossing. In the auto she starts in pursuit and after a hot race intercepts it, warns the engineer of the danger, and the train is backed onto a sidetrack just in time to let the president's special go by.

The picnic train backs down to the switch shanty where Farley is found almost insane. After many assurances that everything is all right, Farley is told to look out on the track, where he beholds Number 19 safe and sound and its windows crowded with happy, cheering children.

DREAMS have been introduced into many pictures, but in Edison's two part farce-comedy to be released July 31 entitled, "The Stuff That Dreams Are Made Of" a dream fills at least one and one-half reels of the film. It is one of those kind of dreams one has when his mind has been overworked or when he is worried; just a string of incidents whose utter impossibility makes them laughable.

Mr. Stephens and his pretty daughter call on Farmer Davis and inform him that his mortgage is due and will be foreclosed. Joe Spifkins, a farmhand, tries to induce Grace to get her father to extend the mortgage. After a lengthy discussion she consents and together they plead with Mr. Stephens to give Farmer Davis a little more time. They succeed in their mission and together return to the farmhouse to break the good news.

In the meantime the farmer's daughter, who is Joe's sweetheart, has seen him talking to Grace and mistaking his earnestness for love has thrown herself on the bed for a "good cry." She falls asleep and has numberless dreams in which she and Joe are persecuted by Grace and her father, but in each of them they escape from the horrible dangers that have been placed in their path.

Awakening with a start she hurries to the kitchen and there sees her lover and their "dream enemies." At first she fears that Joe has forsaken her entirely, but is assured of the contrary by his placing his arm around her and telling her the good news of the extension of the mortgage.

"THE LAST ASSIGNMENT" is of a different character from the others which Dolly "scooped" for The Comet. It marks the last chapter of Dolly's employment on the staff of the newspaper which she has served so well in the capacity of reporter, and will be released July 25.

Mr. Desmond, hard pressed by creditors and short of money, does not share his wife's enthusiasm at the resignation and expected arrival of their daughter, Dolly, The Comet's "star" reporter.

At the station Dolly is met by the mayor, a band, a large crowd of citizens, and, of course, her mother. At home her father is glad to see her but nevertheless seems preoccupied when greeting her, as his mind dwells upon his financial troubles.

She places in his hand a check for $3,000 and immediately the cloud is lifted. His daughter's money, enough to cover all of his debts, saves him from the shame of bankruptcy.

In the office of The Comet the editor, James Malone, comes to realize, by Dolly's absence, that she meant more in his life than he had before known. An inspiration seizes him and he leaves at once for the Desmond residence. Malone outlines the plans of the last assignment and Dolly fully agrees with him, the last scene of the film showing them folded in each other's arms.

Just A Moment Please

Well, the glorious Fourth has came and went and we hope you're all back on the job again with a full allotment of fingers and toes.

As for us—well, we feel a hundred years old after being chump enough to imagine that we were still young enough to play baseball—however, as somebody has so wisely remarked, "There's no fool like an old fool!"

"I wonder if they're really married."
"That pianist can sure tickle the ivories."
"I wish those folks ahead wouldn't keep their heads so close together."
"I laugh myself sick at these Keystone comedies."
"Lowney's fresh chocolates; fresh salted peanuts!"

Perhaps, a certain well known party has remarked, it's "only psychological," but will somebody please tell us why this sudden unrest among the publicity men. First our friend Lloyd Robinson "flew the coop" and then Charley Nixon announced that he was to take himself and his dictionary to other parts. This week our good friend Don Meaney slips us the "info" that he's "through," and Phil Mindil has quit, so we are beginning to wonder where it's all going to stop. The new chaps are fine lads—every one of them—but why all this moving about? May first is some weeks past and October first is yet to come.

ISN'T IT SHAMEFUL?

Sir:—

Has anybody yet informed you that on Sunday the Forest Park theater displayed a banner which read as follows:

FOREST PARK
"DISHONORED"
IN FOUR REELS.

We, who live in the neighborhood, object to such undesirable publicity.

K. R. G.

Now we're in hot water over that bum poetry we published last week, as the chap whose initials were attached to the stuff as published, declares emphatically that he never wrote a line of it—that it's far below the quality of verse he's accustomed to grind, and that now his reputation is ruined. He even threatens us with a libel suit, and, by heck, some of the things he has promised to do to us fairly makes the blood run cold.

And that isn't the worst of it. Suppose the chap who really wrote the stuff now reads the argument being waged over it. Suppose he takes offense at the insinuation made in the above paragraph and also goes on the warpath. Talk about the horns of a dilemma! Can you imagine a worse pickle than we are in at present? Pauline never had any worse perils than ours, and we haven't any "Harry" to help us escape.

Troubles never come singly, do they? Noting that our office mate, Caine, had been exceedingly busy all morning, and taking advantage of the period when he was at lunch to give the "once over" to the copy he had been mulling over, we discover that our last week's reference to "the town that Schlitz made famous" has got him all riled up. Lying on his desk at this very moment is a document addressed to us which says in part:

"—and being from said town ourselves, we wish to state that there are other things in that there burg besides Schlitz—for instance, Pabst. We are not through with this matter yet, as it is an insult not to be lightly treated, but we are sitting quietly in the corner counting ten, as our mother told us to do when we became exceedingly peeved."

Now, he hasn't handed in this black-hand message yet, but by heck, we can see trouble coming. The problem of conduct instantly arises as to what we shall do when he delivers his ultimatum.

However, now that the A. B. C. mediators have nothing better to do, perhaps they'd consent to act in our behalf.

Fourth Annual League Convention

Brief Dayton Report

DAYTON will never have another national convention of motion picture exhibitors. With all due respect to those gentlemen who drew rings on the map, saying that from four to six thousand exhibitors were easily accessible to the Ohio city and would surely attend the fourth annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, the first executive session of the convention closed its doors on sixty accredited and acceptable delegates. Of this number, with the single exception of the District of Columbia, none were really entitled to their seats, if the constitution and by laws had been lived up to.

The total registration Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock numbered one hundred and four. Internal dissension among the members was apparent on all sides. Some of the delegates seated in the convention were sent with instructions to defeat the national president.

Some of the visiting exhibitors who traveled the longest distances were denied admission to the National League convention. They were the men who had no interest in the politics of the National League —men most sincere in wanting an amalgamation of the two bodies designated as the International Motion Picture Association and the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

The committee of seven, appointed at New York last month, to confer with a like committee at Dayton, up until Tuesday evening, June 7th, had held several conferences. Attending these conferences representing the League, were: M. A. Neff, Ohio, Orene Parker, Kentucky, George H. Wiley, Missouri, T. P. Finnegan, Texas, R. L. McNab, New York, Mark E. Cory, California, and Peter Jeup, Michigan. Representing the International Association were: S. H. Trigger, New York, Sam Bullock, Ohio, F. J. Rembusch, Indiana, F. J. Herrington, Pennsylvania, W. J. Sweeney, Illinois, Judge A. P. Tugwell, California, and Charles H. Phillips, Wisconsin.

At the first meeting of these joint committees, convened Monday, July 6, the International Association committee offered two resolutions, the first being,

Resolved: That this committee cannot amalgamate with any organization under the terms of the resolution by which these were elected, unless the said organization is opposed to all forms of legalized censorship.

The other,

Resolved: That it be to the best interests of all concerned that the committee recommend the only method of amalgamation that can be made possible will be by the elimination of the officers of both organizations and that the control of the amalgamated forces should be vested in a national executive board, comprising the membership of the executive boards of both organizations.

These resolutions were thoroughly discussed, pro and con, before the meeting adjourned. To indicate their reception by the League, it is only necessary to quote the national president in a statement he made at the Tuesday morning session. He is credited with having said, "There was no agreement of any kind and the executive committee of the League accepted the proposition of the Association committee and will present it before the convention at the proper time and under the proper rule of business. The executive committee has no power whatever to enter into an agreement with any other organization and the organization itself has no power to pass upon who is eligible for membership in a state or local organization. Anyone desiring to become a member of the League must first join the local if they are within the jurisdiction of a local or they can join a state branch. The National League cannot accept members from a state that is organized, without the consent of the state."

Tuesday, when the matter was presented before the League convention, its committee was increased to ten members and action in the matter was again deferred.

The sessions of the convention were held on the third floor of the Parker School, known in Dayton as the First Year High School. The stairs are concrete all the way up. The building is inscribed, "To those who gave much and to those who gave all." At a spirited session of the convention, Wednesday, the election of officers was held, resulting as follows:

Marion S. Pearce
Nat'l President

T. P. Finnigan
1st Vice President

Mark E. Cory,
2d Vice President

Peter G. Geup
Nat'l Treasurer

President, Marion S. Pearce of Maryland; First Vice-President, T. P. Finnegan of Texas; Second Vice-President, Mark E. Cory of California; Secretary, W. R. Wilson of Ohio; Treasurer, Peter J. Jeup of Michigan.

Directly opposite the Parker School is Memorial Hall, where the exhibits were displayed. The space buyers represented the industry in general.

CONVENTION NOTES.

If you will run back through the files of this burning taper of light you will find the prophecy that Dayton will never have another national convention of motion picture exhibitors. That goes seventeen ways.

Neff held true to form. He has a new gavel—a heavier one. His table was 3x6 feet, oak, two inch solid top and four by four legs. Nothing gave out.

Frank Rembusch labeled himself with a business card

pinned to his necktie. Just as if he needed an introduction. Mrs. Rembusch was with him; this being her first convention.

There was one or two great blow-hards at the convention—those big typhoon fans. Truly life savers for Tuesday registered 102° at 7:30 a. m.

Everybody was up in arms about the hotel treatment. The schedules were all higher than normal and the question was frequently asked, "Who gets the split?" Many of the visitors found shelter in private boarding houses.

Columbus exhibitors—some few of them—came over in automobiles and brought basket lunches. They were the wise ones.

Babe Farnham was there with all his clothes. He took a bath every two hours; was shaved twice a day and has his regular little afternoon nap. It is a gay life.

F. O. Neilson, owner of "The Spoilers" in five states, knows what a bear means to a Gypsy Camp. Ask him.

The colored gentry in the dining room of the Algonquin know how to sink a frappe in a cold cup of bouillon. You always learn something when you get away from home.

As a traveler Judge Tugwell has them all backed off the boards. The judge lives in Los Angeles and runs a picture show or three. When he hears of a national convention he telephones for a cross-country section and flips the first train. He was everywhere at New York and stood hitched at Dayton. There was nothing to do at Dayton except to find a corner and stay put. The Judge plays the game in the open. He is a steady performer and he enjoyed the film show at Memorial Hall because that was the only thing to do.

Chas. H. Phillips of Milwaukee was the unprofitable American plan hotel guest. When he saw the menu—all at the same price, he ordered the whole bill of fare. And what is more, he ate all that was served. We know now why Phillips is so small. He was stunted in his youth by carrying around so much food. As an eater he is champion in the bantam class.

Tuesday, far into the night, ran the indignation meeting of space buyers. I had to duck to catch my train. Will the temporary chairman please excuse the rude, unexplained get-away?

Joe Brandt bought two more silk suits at Dayton. He said he had to play some kind of a game for an even break and he found a fire sale of his favorite raiment. It was once when Joe didn't print a daily, which illustrates that he couldn't rise to the possibilities on all occasions.

Grant Anson had to lie abed while his clothes were being pressed and he said those were his happiest moments.

The busiest of all the attendants was our old college chum McQuade. I think he was hustling for a raise in salary—or something.

Flickers was there, yowling his head off because his paper wasn't up to expectations. Most of us would be happy to have what was left out.

Lloyd Robinson was found paging the National Cash Register plant for Caw-ard. He wanted to find the Pres. of the Art College he had endowed for a million. It is Ka-ward, regular cap A sound to the a in the first syllable. Lloyd is losing flesh. Travel doesn't seem to agree with him.

The really sore member of the convention delegates was A. H. Abrams of Canton's Lyceum Theater. Neff cracked him on the knuckles with his iron gavel.

This man Neff is terribly awful. He appointed his own credentials committee—no other executive ever does that. Suggestions that meet his approval are whipped into motions that are entertained and spread on the minutes. Motions that are not approved are never heard or are out of order. Neff is czar at his own show. The Dayton meeting was in confirmation of all I've said. Neff makes lots of subscribers for me. That's why I like his entertainments.

As host the National Cash Register Company is supreme. Patterson should accept the presidency of the exhibitors of North America; put the unruly members—the rock throwers of Slinktown—into his gardens and make 'em grow vegetables and things. Patterson has a theater with rubber walls. When everybody gets in it seats 1,150, but it is fully seated all the time. Sam Trigger is going to build one like Patterson's when he can get started right. He won't start till the big amalgamated exhibitors' body is working in shipshape.

One of the prominent features of the exposition was the Nicholas Power Company, 90 Gold street, New York, exhibition. In this booth were found B. Bohannon, F. Swett and H. Griffin demonstrating the Powers 6-A projecting machines and a large model of the intermittent movement. This latter proved very interesting, as it showed why there is so little wear and tear on the film when the device is used.

Precision Machine Company, 90 Gold street, New York, had on exhibition the Simplex 1914 models and cameras, rewinders, an Australian lamp house and aluminum pedestals for road work. In charge of the booth were H. B. Coles, sales manager, assisted by David F. Cowan.

Recording & Computing Company, Dayton, Ohio, showed a number of cash security recorders to take place of tickets. This device uses real money, which is counted by the machine. D. B. Whistler demonstrated, assisted by P. J. Mitten.

R. D. Hanish and W. C. Moore, representing the Rex Film Renovator Company, Columbus, Ohio, demonstrated the Rex film renovating machine.

Selig Polyscope Company, 20 East Randolph street, Chicago, Ill., had an illuminated display of well known Selig stars. C. L. Hull and John Pribyl were in charge.

Theater Specialty Manufacturing Company, New York City, had a booth displaying a full line of brass frames, railings and lobby display apparatus. W. R. Hughes and T. W. Armstrong were in charge.

Typhoon Fan Company, 1544 Broadway, New York, had three of the well known Typhoon fans running, furnishing fresh, cool air to the exhibition floor, in which the exhibitors were very much interested. E. Glantsberg, assisted by Miss Rosemond Ball, had charge of the exhibit.

An attractive booth was that of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, 1600 Broadway, New York, which was in charge of Joe Brandt and which exhibited lobby displays of prominent actors and actresses with that company.

Warner's Features, 130 West Forty-sixth street, New York, represented by S. B. Kramer and F. E. Hammer of the Indianapolis office and H. Charnas of Cleveland, showed lobby display racks of current feature releases.

The World Film Corporation, 130 West Forty-sixth street, New York, exhibit consisted of splendid lobby displays of current features and the Shubert and Brady combined enterprises. Representing this company were C. Brehm and J. N. Gilman of the Cincinnati office, and L. Painter and W. W. Kolb of the Cleveland office.

Rudolph Wurlitzer Company, 121 East Fourth street, Cincinnati, Ohio, had six kinds of organs and photoplay orchestras. They also had a $15,000 Hope Jones unit orchestra on the elaborately decorated stage of Memorial Hall.

Wyanoak Publishing Company, 146 West Fifty-second street, New York, had a complete display of lobby cards in sepia and colors to be used with standing racks or in frames. Two painted Indians attracted considerable attention to the booth, which was in charge of Thomas Moore.

Makes Use of Accidents

Romaine Fielding is perhaps one of the quickest thinkers among the present day directors and it is seldom he allows an accident which happens to his troupe to go without incorporating it into a screen play he has in mind.

The other day a horse unfortunately broke a leg while Fielding was staging an attack of Indians upon a prairie schooner for a western picture, and had to be shot. The alert director at once took several views of a man firing behind the fallen horse, the realistic effect of which was wonderful.

Movable Roof on Picture Theater

In a recent issue of the Electrical World a motion picture theater with a movable roof is described, the article reading as follows:

By means of motor-operated roof leaves, the Princess Theater, Meridian, Miss., can be quickly converted into an open-air auditorium, or at the approach of a sudden shower the covering can be almost instantly rolled back into place while the performance goes on uninterrupted. The 20-foot by 40-foot opening in the roof is arranged with movable leaves which travel on small rails and are operated by cables passing over a double drum gear driven by a 3 h. p. motor. The two closed cable loops are wrapped on the drum in opposite directions and each operates one leaf. The control rope, which moves simultaneously with the main leaves, has dogs mounted at the limits of its travel. These dogs operate a reversing switch which stops the motor and connects it ready for starting in the opposite direction. About one minute is required to open or close the roof, moving both leaves through their entire travel. The construction of the joints about the opening is such that the roof is thoroughly weatherproof. Motors, gears and switches are housed in roof boxes.

Unhappy Story of Anne Boleyn Is Filmed

French Players Starred

ONE of the best of the historical films being exhibited at the present time is the three-reel "Anne Boleyn," released by George Kleine through the General Film Company. The picture is from the Kleine-Eclipse studio and was prepared for the screen by Max Pemberton, the celebrated English novelist.

Exteriors typical of England and costumes appropriate to the period of 1532, the year in which the story opens, serve to make the picture convincing and educational, for the history of the unfortunate wife of Henry VIII is closely adhered to in the making of the film.

Stars from the leading English and Parisian theaters enact the leading roles in the stirring and romantic drama, and all are cast to the best advantage. Though his part in the story is comparatively subordinate to the roles of Anne Boleyn and Henry VIII, special mention should be made of the player who enacts the role Will Somers, the court jester, for his byplay during the important scenes is particularly good and aids not a little in "getting over" the big scenes with the proper punch to them.

The interiors, showing the court of Henry VIII, the throne room, the boudoir of Anne Boleyn, and the interior of the Tower of London are all convincing and not in the least stagey looking, though all are undoubtedly studio sets.

As the story opens we behold Queen Catherine and her attendants assembled on the lawn to listen to Sir Thomas Wyatt, a handsome young courtier, who is reciting to the queen some verses he has composed. Standing near the queen and an interested listener to the oratory is pretty Anne Boleyn, the queen's new lady-in-waiting. Suddenly King Henry VIII, who has heard of the beauty and grace of Anne, approaches across the lawn and under pretense of paying his respects to the queen, seeks to attract the attention of Anne.

The lady-in-waiting, however, is much interested in Sir Thomas Wyatt, who has been paying her attentions, and at the first opportunity the two young people stroll off in the gardens by themselves. The king has seen Anne leave however and he sends his jester, Will Somers, to spy upon them.

to shower her with rich gifts, to give hunts and balls in her honor and otherwise to pay her every attention due the royal favorite. One day in the forest, remarking the absence of Wyatt and Anne, the king goes in search of them and encounters Herne, the hunter, the legendary demon of Windsor Forest, who is wont to appear to hunters and others and warn them of the future. In a vision Herne shows the king the young lovers clasped in each others arms, thereby arousing Henry to a high pitch of jealousy. Henry will brook no rival and immediately hastens away in the direction indicated by Herne and comes upon the lovers in exactly the position he had seen them in the vision. behold Herne, the huntsman. Again the strange creature conjures up a vision in which he foretells Anne that she will meet her death at the hands of the executioner. Though terrified at the vision she has beheld, Anne goes bravely on with her new career and for two years rules proudly over England and the heart of England's king.

And then one day Jane Seymour appears in court. Instantly attracted by this new flame, Henry plans, with the assistance of his evil genius, Lord Suffolk, to rid himself of Anne and clear the road for a marriage with Jane. Eager to win favor with the king, Suffolk forges a note, supposed to have been written by the queen, asking Wyatt to come to her at Windsor. The banished poet falls an easy victim to the plot and quickly responds to his lady's plea. Arriving at Windsor, Wyatt is conducted by a secret passage to the boudoir of the queen and admitted through a narrow door in the wall.

Anne's surprise is so great however on beholding him that Wyatt instantly knows the message from her must have been a false one. The lovers realize that they are the victims of a plot and Anne urges Wyatt to leave at once by the same passage through which he reached her, but alas, the door is found to have been fastened on the other side. Trapped like two beasts in a cage, the doomed lovers wait the next development of the plot. And all too quickly sounds are heard without in the corridor and King Henry, himself, demands admittance.

Concealing Wyatt behind a curtain, Queen Anne admits her lord and within a few moments is humiliated and terrified to have the king discover Wyatt's presence. Henry orders the pair placed under arrest and ere nightfall Anne is conveyed by boat to the Tower of London.

Following a few days of imprisonment the queen is taken before a jury composed of Henry's tools and is sentenced to death "for treason to the crown." While awaiting Anne's execution, Henry goes with Jane Seymour to Blackheath, there to await the signal which will announce that Anne is dead and that Jane can be made the next queen of England.

A touching and pathetic scene depicts the final farewell of Anne in the Tower of London, and then we see her led forth to be executed. Proudly she ascends the scaffold and arranges her hair that the public executioner may more easily and surely inflict the death blow. The axe is raised aloft, above the quivering neck of the unhappy queen, and a moment later the cannon booms out the signal which tells Henry that Anne is dead. Once more free, Henry sets about his plans for making Jane Seymour his third wife.

Thanhouser Company Opens Park

"Thanhouser Park," surrounding the Thanhouser studio, was dedicated by the residents of New Rochelle on Tuesday, July 7. So proud are the New Rochelle people of their city's star industry that they turned out with bands to honor the man who is keeping the name of New Rochelle before the world. That man is Charles J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Company. Mr. Hite ordered open house Tuesday, and every man, woman and child in New Rochelle was welcome at the studio. The park is located to the east of the main building in the Thanhouser group and contains numerous driveways, rustic bridges, and bungalows. Most wonderful of all is a fall over which water rushes and tumbles, just as though Nature had planned what Joseph Turner, Thanhouser's scenic artist, has built. The new park is primarily intended for picture work, but it is so extensive that Mr. Hite says he will not deny residents of New Rochelle from resting under the great trees or strolling along the winding driveways.

Thomas Writes All Star Scenario

The first original script for photoplay production to come from the pen of a famous playwright is "The Nightingale," a feature which is being produced by the All Star Film Corporation and which was conceived and developed for the screen by the eminent dramatist, Augustus Thomas.

Miss Ethel Barrymore appears in the leading role of the production and is supported by a cast of capable players which would be a credit to any Broadway success, among whom are Charles Stevenson, George Andrews, William Courtleigh, Jr., and Conway Tearle.

The fact that Mr. Thomas has been responsible for the entire script of "The Nightingale," will probably have a far reaching effect on the views of other prominent playwrights in regard to the screen. The picture is booked for release early in August.

Coquette's Laugh Is Stilled Forever

Heartless Woman Punished

THOSE who have grown accustomed to seeing Kathlyn Williams act only in jungle pictures, or films in which she was required to perform hair raising feats before the camera, with savage tigers and huge lions as her companions, will be both surprised and delighted with "A Woman Laughs," which is the two-reel Selig release of July 20.

In this picture the inimitable Kathlyn appears as a vivacious coquette, whose heart has turned to ice within her bosom, though her beauty is still so great that she attracts man after man to his ultimate doom. A heartless laugh, cold, hollow and the very mockery of mirth, in each case ends the affair of the moment and the coquette goes on in search of newer game, until, at last, she is frightened by a desperate man whom she has flouted and, crushed and whimpering, stumbles out into the darkness, with her heartless laughter choked forever by her fear.

The coquette only laughed when Scott threatened to shoot himself.

An entirely new side to Miss Williams' art is exposed in this picture and the famous Selig leading woman makes the most of every scene. Edward Wallock, Charles Clary and Harry Lonsdale form a most capable support for the talented lead, and a new young woman to Selig films appears in the role of Scott's sister and, by her good looks and winsome ways, adds much to the value of the picture. This latter actress is unmentioned in the cast furnished by the Selig company and her identity is unknown to this reviewer.

Pretty backgrounds, well lighted interiors and photography of a satisfying kind unite to make "A Woman Laughs" a most entertaining feature. The story itself is from the pen of W. E. Wing, and Norval MacGregor is credited with being the producer.

As the story opens we learn that Clara (the role played by Miss Williams) is engaged to Louis, an old and very dear friend of David's. David had been badly injured and for a time his life had been dispaired of, but good physicians were able to start him back on the road to recovery and it was during his convalescence that Louis brought his fiancee to call upon him.

Clara seemed much impressed by Louis' friend, and took it upon herself to call frequently thereafter to chat with the sick man and occasionally to read to him. Louis surprised her on several of her visits but the girl was cool enough to lightly excuse her presence in David's garden and Louis thought his suspicions of a too great intimacy between his fiancee and his friend to be ill founded.

As for David, he had been much distressed at Clara's informal calls and on one occasion had tried to dissuade her from coming so often, only to be rewarded for his trouble by having the girl throw her soft arms about his neck and threaten to scold him if he continued his lecture. Poor David, he little knew that Louis had happened into the garden at just that moment and beheld the embrace through the bushes. Naturally Louis was insanely jealous in a moment and believed that David had encouraged the girl to fall in love with him.

David was quick to sense a change in his friend and that very evening set out to call upon Clara and insist upon her ending the engagement to Louis, since he was sure only unhappiness would result from such a union. Before starting to call upon Clara, David had told Louis that he was sure the girl was unworthy of him and hinted that the engagement should be ended. Louis at once decided that David was trying to end the affair, that he might win Clara for himself, and accordingly determined to leave him a clear field. Entering David's study, Louis wrote a note to Clara, declaring that he was "through with them both, forever" and then tore up the photograph of his fiancee and prepared to leave the city. Before going he stepped to the electric kettle which stood on David's sideboard and was about to mix himself a libation, but at that moment something went wrong on the switchboard of a power plant in another part of the city and the entire voltage of the overcharged wire reached Louis as he touched the kettle, and instantly killed him.

David returned from his interview with Clara to find Louis dead, with the torn photograph and other signs of his broken hopes scattered about the room. Since he believed that Clara's conduct was directly responsible for his friend's suicide, for David thought Louis' death could only be self inflicted, David rushed back to Clara's home and dragged her forth to behold the results of her fickleness. She looked at the dead man on the floor and then laughed long and loudly. As she heard the officers coming to investigate the death which had already been reported to them, she threw her arms about David's neck and exclaimed, "Let them come in, they will find us both here!" David was instantly seized with fear, for he realized that the note implicated himself as well as the girl, so he permitted her to go and as she passed through the door she laughed again and left him alone with his friend.

The officers quickly discovered the real cause of Louis' death, thus dissipating the suicide theory, but, the funeral over, David, seeking forgetfulness, went west and busied himself in improving a vast tract of land he had acquired some years before. The world is small, however, and a month or two later David was astonished to have Scott, one of his engineers, appear upon the scene with his sister and a gayly attired young woman whom he introduced as his fiancee. David instantly recognized Clara in the young woman, though her coquettish glances seemed one moment to be inviting him to fall in love with her himself, while the next they seemed boldly challenging him to reveal what he knew of her past.

Resolved to give Scott a chance for happiness, David kept silent, until he, one day, discovered Clara in the embrace of George, another man of the construction camp. Straightway David gave Scott an inkling of what was taking place and the latter was able soon to discover things for himself. Indignantly confronting Clara, he told her what he had seen and, drawing his revolver, would have shot himself had not David interferred at that moment. The girl only laughed, called Scott's action "silly pantomime" and, throwing his engagement ring to the ground, strolled off with her new admirer.

David then told Scott the whole story of Clara's past and when the young engineer would have gone forth to deliberately kill her, the older man counseled him to "Let her live and make her pay." That night as she was packing up, preparatory to leaving, Clara received a note signed "George" asking her to come to a certain trysting spot immediately. Upon reaching the place she found awaiting her not George, but Scott, grim, cold, and in a mood to seek revenge. Sure that he intended to kill her, the girl fled madly through the night and for mile after mile Scott grimly followed her. At last, worn and exhausted, she made her way back to her room, and when morning dawned Scott faced her on the lawn of David's home. The girl overheard Scott telling David "She is a woman and I cannot bear to avenge the wrong she inflicted upon me."

Relieved to find that her life was not to be taken, the girl rushed back to her room and finished her packing. Then, with the laugh gone forever from her lips, aged and careworn, the siren slunk away and faded from the lives of all who had known her.

Western Vitagraphers Entertained

On Friday, June 26, one of the beach resorts near Santa Monica, Cal., was given over to Vitagraph players to rule for the evening. It has a noted band and the leader took a vacation for one evening while various stars led the band. Miss Schaefer started the line and was followed by Mr. Stanley, Jane Novak, Bud Duncan, Miss Myrtle Gongalez, George Kunkel, B rtie Pitcairn, Stephen Smith, Jr., and Margaret Gibson. After they did their bits, Duane Wager, former stage manager of the company and now owner of the largest theater on the beach, gave the party a surprise in the form of a reception at the Breakers Club.

By Mabel Condon

Take away the toupee and you have W. A. Williams, "natural."

"WAW-WAW" is the name that William A. Williams answers to, on occasions. Because of his initials, you see; and as he gave himself that nick-name, he can't possibly object to your knowing that he has it. "William A. Williams — 'Waw-Waw sauce,' y' know," was how he bequeathed himself the name and during the giving he swung his maple walking-stick and doffed his straw hat so that the breeze that came down the Hudson and met the good ship George Washington as it went up, could blow through his brown locks and prove that they waved of their own accord.

It was the day of the Pathe excursion a year ago. Since then there have been changes that affected both the Williams' fortune and the Williams' hair. The former has prospered, the latter has thinned. But the wave is still there, and it is still natural. So also is William A. Williams; so much so that he tells one about how thin his hair is getting before one has a chance to tell him, and then he changes the topic to that of Lake Placid, N. Y., and invites one to go up there and have a three-days look, if one doubts any of the nice things he (William A. Williams) tells about it. One doesn't doubt but accepts the invitation, anyhow.

For that is where the Excelsior studio is located and it is where William A. Williams and others of the Excelsior company are working when they're not motor-boating or autoing or fishing or in some other nice way speeding away the hot weather.

And that's where a year has placed William A. Williams. Just previous to that he played in the film "Checkers," and a few other features, and just previous to that he did a circuit of eastern picture houses telling interested audiences of actual incidents connected with picture-making.

"I got together some real money during that talk-trip," explained Mr. Williams just the other day, "and Harry Handworth and I got chummy on the subject of making pictures and while the Excelsior company is by no means my property, it really is the outcome." And William A. Williams can be seen in any release the Excelsior people put out.

It was just before he left the Pathe company last summer that he related, with gestures, the events of his life up to that time. It was the same day I disobeyed the sign "Keep out of the hall" and advanced to the dressing-room of Ned Burton that I learned that William A. Williams can sing and can trill his voice like some variety of bird (I don't know just what variety), and not only that, but he yodels. It was while Mr. Burton was telling me that somebody said he looks like John Bunny that a voice from the dressing-room next door burst forth in halting and high-voiced acclaim of "O'La-idee! O'—"

"Shut up, Williams!" Mr. Burton ordered, and continued his story.

Five minutes was the limit of silence for the voice, for at the expiration of that time it caroled forth—"Listen to the mocking bird! Listen to the mocking birrr-rr-rd!"

I said good bye to Mr. Burton and tapped on the door of the songster. The pass-word was "Waw-Waw sauce," and the duplicate W. A. W. bowed me into a chair with one hand while he held on a gray mustache with the other.

"The 'stick' is just fresh on it," he explained opening his mouth ever so little so as to discourage any attempt the mustache might make to fall off. But the little gray dab stayed on and after exercising the muscles of his mouth in various ludicrous ways to determine if it intended to stay on, Mr. Williams decided it did, and smiled broadly.

"Singing, you see, came quite natural to me, and I came to the stage by way of singing," Mr. Williams confided, in explanation of the vocal acrobatics that had interrupted Mr. Burton. "It was in Buffalo—I was born in Buffalo—that I began my stage work as a quartet. Yes, a quartet. You see, there had been four of us and we signed with Joe Gates on a singing tour. None of us had ever been on the stage and we had tried for over a year to get somebody to sign us. Joe Gates did, finally, and then the other three fellows all backed out. One couldn't leave his business, another had a girl chum who wouldn't let him leave, and the third was nowhere to be found when it came to going. So I went myself. The man to whom we were to report met me and asked, 'Where's the quartet? I thought there was to be a quartet!' I replied, 'There is—I'm the quartet.'

"Well," he went on, powdering the hair at his temples, "they kept me and I sang myself out of vaudeville into a straight part in 'Checkers.' Then the show became stranded in Maine and I had an awful time getting back to Broadway. I haunted the agencies, but it was summer and there was nothing to be had. Then one day I met Pat Powers on the street—"

"The Pat Powers?" I interrupted, and he answered: "The same! I asked, 'How are bicycles?' He had been in the bicycle business when I had known him previously. But he said he was interested in motion pictures just then, and asked me how I'd like a job in them. It suited me, I told him. But when I saw my first efforts on the screen I sneaked away. Disgusted? I was the homeliest looking person I ever saw; I acted foolish and I felt ashamed and it was a couple of weeks before I dared try another.

"But that was better. I put on a tramp make-up and it became me so well that I decided I'd better stick to tramps. But I didn't. I tried every other variety of role, and when I left Mr. Power's company I came here. That was about a year ago." He paused while he brushed some yellow powder off his gray trousers, then crossed a gray silk ankle over his knee, and continued:

"One of the first things I worked in was a Postum picture. It was made for the Postum company as an ad and showed a broken down young man develop into a full-of-life-and-energy chap, by the simple interior appliance of Postum. I was both young men and I was so full of Postum by the time I was through I made up my mind if there were any retakes they'd have to give me something else to drink. And what do you think happened?" I refused to think. "The picture didn't suit and we were asked to make the whole thing over. But we haven't—not yet.

"It's great work, though, this picture business," Mr. Williams declared. "Compared to stock—I forgot to tell you I was in stock. Yes, I was in stock. And I played lead in 'Quincy Adam Sawyer' for three years. But you can be more people in pictures than you could think of being in stock. Hence the variety—not that variety's always acceptable. For instance, when I left on that singing trip with Joe Gates I had to change from a Yiddish comedian to a coon, a wench and a juvenile. I felt like a spotted leper half the time; I'd wash but I'd never feel clean. In the next turn my cue was, 'By jove! the cat's out of the bag!' I was the cat."

"Impossible!" I doubted William A. Williams, the tall, the athletic, the cheery, the debonair William A. Williams! You, too, would have wondered how any manager could have cast him in any but the ever-in-time hero.

"But quite true," Mr. Williams contradicted. "I dread to think what would have happened had I followed the vocation my mother picked out for me."

"And that?" I asked, acting upon the thought to leave for one of those Jersey cars before they stopped running for the night.

"A minister," replied Mr. Williams.

His dread, then, was quite natural. I didn't mind sharing in it.

Pathe Player A Sculptor

Distinguished not alone as an actor of unusual dramatic ability, M. O. Penn, Pathe leading man, is a sculptor, painter and singer of very exceptional talent. While he excels perhaps, with the brush and pallette—his landscapes and portraits being now on exhibition both in America and abroad—it is in sculpturing, his hobby, that he finds his greatest delight. Particularly striking samples of his marked genius are two splendid casts which he has just completed of the officers of the American Pathe—Mr. A. Roussel and Paul Bonvillain. Prior to these he made casts of the celebrated Pathe star, Crane Wilbur, and the well known Pathe directors, Louis Gasnier and Frank Powell. But it was in Paris, where many of his casts are now on exhibition, that he achieved his success as a sculptor. He was born in the United States in the year 1870. While still a youngster his highly artistic temperament began to assert itself, and at the tender age of ten years he was sent to Paris under the guardianship of an uncle to get his elementary schooling and commence his studies in painting. Under the tutorship of Trupheme and Besnard at the Julian Academy he progressed rapidly, and later took up sculpturing. At the age of twenty he found it necessary to provide his own livelihood, and having an opportunity to do cabaret work at the Chat-Noir, spent his evenings there in the midst of a brilliant sparkling atmosphere, while his days he applied to the more sober pursuance of his studies. It was not long before frequenters of the celebrated restaurant noting the rapidly developing dramatic possibilities of the cabaret singer, began to call for him continually. The jolly old proprietor looked with approval upon the aspiring young student-artist, and chuckled. But at the end of the winter, Penn, longing for excitement which he could not find in Paris, joined the French army and spent the next three years in Africa. When at last he came back to the French capital he at once took up dramatic studies in the Paris Conservatory under Sylvain, and returned to the bright lights and music of the Chat-Noir where he made the acquaintance of Oscar Metenier, who, appreciating his dramatic and artistic possibilities, asked him to take part in a new political play which he was producing at the Grand Guignol. It was the beginning of Penn's dramatic career. At the end of two years he had become so accomplished that he organized a touring company, and traveled through France, Belgium, and Germany for about twelve years. Returning to Paris, he played in the Theatres Athenee, Geinier, Sarah Bernhardt, Apollo and Olympia. During this time moving pictures had been pushing farther and farther to the front, and with the demand increasing for first class talent, Penn took up work in the silent drama. The great French house of Pathe saw in him a screen artist of unusual ability, and so it came about that he played with them for several years. The desire to see America again, which had been with him since boyhood, then came upon him stronger than ever, and at his request he was transferred to the American branch of Pathe in Jersey City. He has been in New York and vicinity now for a little over two years.

Players Die in Quicksands

Miss Grace McHugh, leading lady of the Colorado Motion Picture Company, and Owen Carter, a cameraman of the same company, lost their lives on July 1 during the taking of a river scene for the production "Across the Border."

While fording the Royal Gorge of the Arkansas River, Miss McHugh became nervous and pulled on the horse's reins so that the animal was forced under water and she was thrown into the river. Mr. Carter leaped into the water and swam with her to a sand bar, which was supposed to be safe, but it proved to be of quicksand, and in a few moments both were engulfed and drowned. Other members of the company who had seen them on the sandbar started for them through the underbrush, but they sunk before the rescuers could reach them.

New Director-Writer for Vitagraph

The Vitagraph Company recently secured the services of Donald I. Buchanan, a feature writer of note, to act as special writer of scenarios and to assist in the direction of features. His first picture is a five-part drama, "Four Thirteen," which he is now assisting Ralph Ince in staging.

A Scientific Detective Story

"The Iron Man"

"The Iron Man" is one of that type of detective dramas which are greatly in demand at the present time, namely, the scientific detective vs. the scientific crook. Good actors and skillfully contrived settings are necessary to put life into such a picture, and this three part Gaumont release of June 27 has its full quota of both.

At no time does the story lag, the continued action and puzzling complications holding the interest and arousing new enthusiasm in each scene. The title is taken from a mechanical-working suit of armor which, when touched on the breast-plate, enfolds all objects near it. Several blurs in the photography are noticeable but not to such an extent that they detract from the value of the picture.

The story first gives us an insight into the character of the Count Servenac, and the ingenious methods he employs in reaching his victims. He frequently entertains at his home, Rochecombe Castle, and becomes known as a person of wealth and position. In the library he has a desk and a treacherous looking suit of armor. One of the drawers of the desk contains a lever that works one of the panels in the wall, and covers the opening of a tunnel that leads to the inn of his confederate some distance away.

It happens that at a fashionable club a wealthy young American, Phillip Travers, makes the acquaintance of Servenac, "a Count of high standing," who becomes interested in him and ascertains that he is motoring to Marseilles and is carrying considerable money with him. Travers resumes his trip but on the road his tire is shot at and punctured from the bushes. A peasant, passing with a cart, offers to take him into a nearby inn and he accepts. Having fixed the tire the chauffeur calls at the inn for his master but is told that he went straight on to Marseilles. At the inn young Travers is drugged, robbed, and never heard from again.

Detective Barnet Parker is told of the strange disappearance and attempts to solve the mystery. In peasant clothes he visits the inn, and is immediately put on his guard by the suspicious attitude of the owner. At night he discovers that there is a tunnel in the basement which leads to a blind staircase, some distance away. He draws a plan of the tunnel and the next day learns that the end of the staircase must be under Rochecombe Castle.

His next move is to gain access to the castle. He meets and cultivates the acquaintance of Servenac under the assumed name of Lord Chilton. A short time later he is invited to the house. In a game of bridge he wins a large sum of money and is automatically marked as a victim by the crooks. Late that night, on the excuse of seeing some pictures, he is invited into the library and there overpowered, robbed, and carried bound and gagged into the cellar. Parker manages to stand up and with his teeth, turn the electric switch on the wall and burns his bonds. He makes his way out of the tunnel, into the garden, and, climbing through a window in the house, goes to the library where he surprises the criminals, forces one of them into the "iron man," and notifies the police, holding the count and his wife at bay until their arrival.

Had Merry Fourth

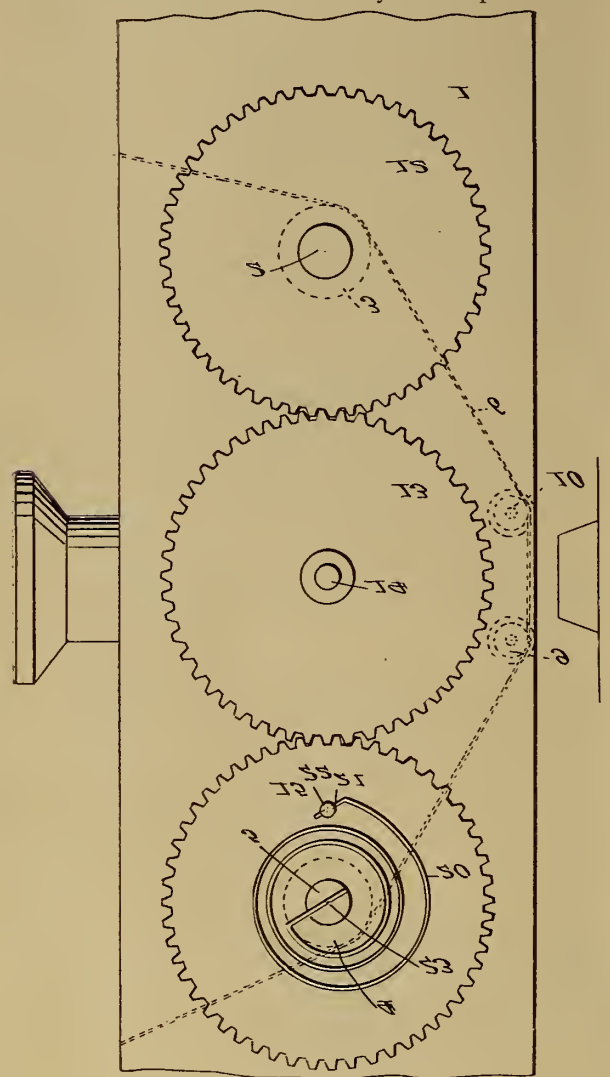
There are many ways of enjoying the Fourth of July, but the stunt of the members and friends of the Excelsior Feature Film Company Inc. at their beautiful studio at Lake Placid, New York, was an odd one.

After an afternoon's work, and a turn or two around the golf course or a sail on the lake, the company organized that old gloom dispeller, a badger fight.

Strictly on the quiet eight or ten "suckers" were picked out. They were notified on the "Q. T." that the fight was to be pulled off that night and that the start was to be made from the studio. Promptly at 10 in the evening some 200 started out.

After the usual preliminaries were passed and rules adopted, betting commenced and in a short time much money was in evidence, and it was real cash too. Just at that moment the place was raided, the real sheriff and his deputies officiating. The whole bunch were arrested, at the end of visibly loaded revolvers. By clever frisking the suckers were all found to have revolvers in their pockets and were therefore handcuffed. The peculiar part was that all swore they did not have them when they arrived. Perhaps Harry Handworth, who directed the affair with his usual cleverness for detail, or William A. Williams can tell something about it. The fright of the poor victims can be imagined. It would hardly be fair to them to mention names, but suffice to say full grown men actually wept large salt tears when the possibility of seven years for carrying a gun, with an additional imprisonment for gambling and animal fighting, confronted them. Such capable actors as Harry Handworth, William A. Williams, Gordon De Maine, Tom Tempest, A. O. Huhn, Hamilton Crane, Francois Pierlot, James Albough, and William H. Wright, the treasurer of the Excelsior, and Arthur Rosenbach, the sales manager, were among those present.

Lady—"Can't you find work?"



Tramp—"No, ma'am, I used to be a moving-picture orchestra drummer, and made all the noises of the horses' hoofs and telephone bells and guns. Edison's new talkin' films has put me on the fritz!"—Puck.

Recent Patents in Motography

By David S. Hulfish

No. 1,057,234. For an Improved Film Tension Device for Motion Picture Projectors. Issued to Carl Green, Logansport, Ind.

This invention has for its object the provision of a moving tension device for the film while in the film gate, instead of the usual fixed spring fingers over which the film is dragged through the gate. A substitute for the rubber rollers of the projecting machine is provided, and the whole mechanism further is so assembled that the film may be run either forward or backward. A fundamental feature of the machine is that everything which touches the film moves at the same speed as the film itself and therefore there is no friction upon the film, and no wearing or scratching.

Referring to the accompanying illustration, 2 is the shaft of the star wheel and carries the intermittent sprocket 3 which drives or pulls the film 6, the film 6 also passing over a sprocket 4 on a shaft 5. Rollers 9 and 10 are in the film gate and the film rests upon them to obtain its proper alinement and registration in the film window.

On the shaft 2 is the gear 12 which through idler 13 on shaft 14 is meshed to gear 15 on shaft 5 carrying sprocket 4, sprockets 4 and 3 thus being caused to move in unison.

But the gear 15 is sleeved loosely upon the shaft 5 while sprocket 4 is rigidly upon shaft 5 the connection between 15 and 5 and therefore between 15 and 4 being by means of the spring 20. Concerning threading up the film, the inventor says:

"If the shaft 5 be turned until there is tension in the spring 20 which then tends to coil up, then the film 6 can be placed or threaded on both sprocket wheels 3 and 4. This action will place the film in tension and there will always be a strong tension. The film will be straight and there will be no jerking or wear or tear of the film. The film when thus under tension will flatten itself on the rollers 9 and 10, thereby aiding in making the views straight. The rollers 9 and 10 will travel in unison with the film and the sprocket wheels, thereby providing a moving tension which obviates the wear and tear incident to stationary tensions."

The claims read upon the combination of upper and lower feeding sprockets with a spring connection to keep the film taut.

No. 1,057,470. For an Improved Screen Mounting for Projection Purposes. Issued to Clayton S. Wertsner, Philadelphia, Penna., assignor to Williams, Browne and Earle, Philadelphia, Penna.

The invention pertains to projection screens which are stretched in frames, the object being to provide suspension devices inside the frame to stretch the canvas screen and to hold it tight and flat at all times.

The screen cloth is provided with a hem in which are inserted stiff strips of wood. These are connected to the frame at top and one side by strong coil springs. At the bottom and remaining side they are connected to the frame by short turn-buckles or swivel-nuts.

Current Educational Releases

In Old England—Kalem. The artillery salute fired in front of Buckingham Palace in honor of the King is the first of the highly interesting English topical scenes shown in this feature. The events which follow show the game of rugby between Scotland and Ireland, the Southern Counties Cross-Country Run, in which hundreds of men took part, and the King and Queen, attended by prominent members of the nobility, on their way to the Royal Ascot Races.

The Heart and the Circulation of the Blood—Pathe. Though detached from the body, the heart of many animals, and among them especially the porpoise, can be made to "beat," showing the muscular pulsations as in the living creature. Likened to a pump, the heart in action is seen to alternately draw in salt water from one receptacle and then force it into another. A closer view exhibits the successive dilations and contractions of the auricles which receive the blood, and of the ventricles which force it on and into the blood vessels. The exterior view of the heart of an ox shows the orifices of the arteries, while a sectional view of the same shows the wall of the left ventricle to be much thicker than that of the right. The heart when dissected shows the valves which separate the cavities or blood chambers. A study of the construction of the artery and the vein shows the one to be of strong elastic tissue, while the other is made up simply of muscular fibre. The circulation of the blood of birds and frogs is interesting as compared with that of the human being.

Modes of Travel in Japan—Pathe. Although but recently opened to the commerce and general educational and industrial advancement of the western world, Japan has not been slow to accept and benefit by modern means of transportation. Due to the peculiar typographical construction of the country, however, many of the more picturesque and characteristic modes of travel such as the jinrikisha and the palaquin are still in general use.

The Ice and Snow—Pathe. The simple experiments connected with the changing of water into snow and ice in the laboratory are the source of much interest even to the casual observer. When one stops to realize that water in its various forms, frozen or liquid, covers considerably over three-quarters of the surface of the earth, one appreciates how great is the fundamental importance of this natural phenomenon.

A Tiger Hunt—Indo-China—Pathe. The beautiful Indian tiger, whose striped hide is so highly prized by European and American furriers, is a veritable pest to the Hindoo natives; not infrequently, when driven to it by hunger, he makes inroads upon the smaller outlying settlements and is the cause of the loss of considerable animal as well as human life. To put an end to his depredations, hunting parties are formed and the tiger is tracked back into the jungle or the hill.

Abandoned prey frequently serves to indicate the path taken by the beast, but great caution has to be exercised to avoid a sudden spring by the great cat from his cover in the low hanging branches of the jungle underbrush. Generally the dogs used are able to point him out, and the hunter "pots" him with a rifle without venturing too near. Though, mortally wounded, the wonderful vitality of the tiger enables him to crawl still farther into the jungle, where, after succumbing to his wounds, the hunters find him quite dead. Slung from a pole, he is carried back into the village amid great rejoicing. Fear of the tiger then becomes a thing of the past and the natives all turn out to celebrate the good fortune of the hunters.

A Russian Boar Hunt—Pathe. The great Russian boar hunts held on the royal preserves are always spirited occasions among the nobility who regularly take part in them. In the presence of the Grand Duke, under whose supervision the hunt is held, the sportsmen prepare for the chase. The Grand Duke assigns shooting places to his guests in order to give each an equal chance. It is not always the hunter, however, who frightens the game, as is seen here when a large flock of wild duck are put to flight by the passing of a herd of deer.

The real object of the royal hunt is the shooting of the great Russian wild boar. At the close of the chase, the sound of the horn in the hands of the whipper-in calls the dogs together where the boar lies dead. It is then seen that many of the dogs have been seriously wounded by the fierce onslaught of the boar, who uses his sharp tusks freely and to great advantage in holding the pursuing pack at bay. The game secured, which includes besides a score or more of wild boar, deer and various water fowl, is indicative of a good day's sport and the hunters, gathering at the royal lodge, celebrate and make merry over their good fortune.

The Wine Industry, Marsala, Sicily—Pathe. The wine industry of southern Europe, and especially Sicily, forms the principal occupation of the large peasant-folk, many of whom frequently know no other kind of employment. The best wines of the world, worth many thousands of dollars, are exported from Sicily annually, and increase very materially the revenues of the government.

Through Bosnia and Dalmatia—Pathe. Southern Austria, at once quaint and picturesque, holds forth many joys for the traveler who delights especially in rambling through those portions of the world that lay away from the beaten path. Of particular interest is the curious little town of Bistrick in Bosnia, which, although now under Austrian rule, was up until 1875 a possession of the Turks. Bistrick's bustling market place is a point of interest and amusement for all visitors. The old Turkish quarter, with its oddly shaped houses and narrow streets, typical of the days when Turkey ruled in Bosnia, never fails as an attraction, while the Isle of Lacroma, situated in a crystal lake with high wooded hills about it, minds one of some half-forgotten story out of the Arabian Nights.

The Port of Spalata, with its varied craft and stevedores, is the principal commercial center of Dalmatia. Farther back from the water front in the beautiful mountainous country surrounding the quaint old town of Eidelitze springs the source of the river Bosnia. Like all southern European countries, Bosnia has its share of ruins. Those at Spalata, called by the Romans Salomia, force a serious thought and in their stern architecture impressively remind one of the ancient times when Rome ruled the world.

Wood Carving and Turning at St. Claude, France (Pathe).—Fancy wood carving and turning is the least known of all manufacturing trades, although its results are everywhere in common use. Much of it is still done by hand, but the use of modern machinery has minimized the hand work and greatly lessened the time consumed in manufacturing. A rough block of wood is prepared for the lathe by a circular saw and then placed in the rapidly moving lathe, where it quickly assumes the desired shape. The "bent wood" effect, so common in chairs, is obtained by cutting wood into curved pieces by means of a band saw. It is then fed into a turning machine, which rounds and polishes the wood in preparation for the cabinet worker, who deftly colors and grains it. So cleverly is this done that expert knowledge is necessary to detect the difference between the artificial and the genuine. The making of a wooden bowl is an interesting operation, but art enters into the trade with the decoration of a clock-case and the exhibition of free-hand drawing is fascinating.

Through the Bosphorus, Turkey (Pathe).—Although only two miles in length the Bosphorus connecting the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora is virtually alive with landmarks of ancient and modern interest. Among these are the Palace of Mohamed V, the old Geonese Fortress, Thrapia—"The Newport of Turkey," and the buildings of the various European embassies.

The Jerboa (Pathe).—The Jerboa is a small four-footed rodent that very much resembles a diminutive Kangaroo. He inhabits the African desert and parts of Europe and although very timid, is far from harmless, as his fondness for grain makes him particularly obnoxious to the farmer.

Sport and Travel in Central Africa (Pathe, five parts).—Captain Machin, in charge of the Pathe expedition to the African jungle, with his staff of cameramen, guides and sharpshooters, set sail from Marseilles and arrived at Alexandria, Egypt, five days later. From there they journey by easy stages to the Nile, then met the first tribe of African natives, the Sudanese.

The first catastrophe of the trip occurred with the death of the expedition's goat, which wandered to a river and suddenly disappeared down the throat of an alligator. The disaster served to inform the explorers that there was hunting at hand, and in a very short while they had bagged a choice collection of the monster alligators. Traveling inland, the explorers passed the spot, marked by monuments, where Lord Kitchener met the Marchand expedition in 1898.

They came to a village south of Kodok, inhabited by the Shilluks, a warlike race, who live in huts of earth and straw. Here they captured a junior monkey. They christened him Coco, and he proved an amusing companion during the rest of the expedition.

Leaving the Shilluks, the explorers came to Tongo, and from there plunged into the wild jungle, which was to afford them many fine pictures, many thrills and innumerable narrow escapes from death.

Leopards, monkeys, lions and other wild creatures peculiar to the region unknowingly posed before the camera.

At Lake No, hippopotamus were discovered and a hunt was immediately organized. Killing the hippos was an easy task compared to bringing home the prizes, some of which measured thirteen feet and weighed nearly four tons.

Next a vulture hunt was organized, and at a great risk a native was lowered into the nest near the top of a mountain. After an exciting battle in mid air, he gave a signal and the hunters helped him up with some fine specimens of these gluttonous creatures.

It is from a bird that dwells in the heart of the African desert that the maribou feathers, commonly used in decorating women's apparel, are obtained. The capture of the maribou is shown.

Farther on a colony of aigrettes was discovered, and a demonstration given of the method of securing their valuable feathers for millinery purposes. Two and three-quarter pounds of the feathers secured by the expedition had a value of $1,200.

The party soon arrived on the Abyssinian frontier, and that night a loud trumpeting revealed the presence of elephants near at hand. Early the next morning a hunt was organized, and in a short time several monster elephants had fallen before the rifles of the hunters.

Having scoured the jungle from end to end, the hunters faced about for home, proud of the thrilling pictures they had secured and congratulating each other on the hairbreadth escapes from charging elephants and leaping leopards which marked the trip throughout.

On the Ice—A Demonstration of Fancy Skating at Wengen, Switzerland (Edison).—Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Syers have perfected a number of intricate and graceful figures which will be of interest to anyone appreciative either of skill or beauty. The picture was taken at Wengen, Switzerland, and on account of the wonderfully dry atmosphere is superb photographically. None of the blur and haze, which so frequently lessen the value of pictures of athletic sports, is at all in evidence. Every movement stands out as distinctly as the etching on a cameo.

The feature of the picture, which will be of greatest interest to patrons of motion picture houses, is an ice dance in which Mr. and Mrs. Syers take part—a sort of tango, magnified a thousand fold in speed and grace. No professional dancer, however clever, could hope to approximate the dash and perfect poise of this beautiful dance.

Simple Experiments in Electricity (Pathe).—Today, with the complex electrical phenomena making our modern life possible, it is still the very simple experiments which hold the interest of the public. For instance, a glass rod, rubbed briskly with a woolen cloth will attract a ball of pith, pieces of paper and bits of feathers. Rosin treated similarly acts similarly, and will also attract a stream of water out of a vertical line. The glass and the rosin are, however, charged oppositely and one is known as the positive pole and the other is negative. Bodies which the positive pole attracts are repelled by the negative, and vice versa.

Bodies so charged only become electrified at the point of rubbing. The stick of rosin rubbed in the middle attracts the ball of pith only at that spot, but the extremities are more susceptible than the center. In these pictures are shown the simple experiments of the Volta disk and the Static Chimes. It is also demonstrated how a person suspended in mid-air can receive the electrical current with one hand and transmit it with the other.

PERSONAL NOTES.

The numerous friends of Don Meaney learned, with much surprise and regret, this week, that the popular Essanay dopester had sent in his resignation, the same to become effective on July 18. Mr. Meaney succeeded Harry Steck as official dopester of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company in Chicago, early in January, 1913, and since that time has made "Essanay" a a household word from New York to Frisco, and from Lake Superior to the Gulf of Mexico, not to mention the breezy items which were so fascinatingly intersting that they got into print abroad. During Mr. Meaney's connection with the Essanay plant, he has not only created the Essanay News, a bright little four page publication, which now is a weekly visitor at the theater of every exhibitor in the United States and which has grown from a four-column, two-page paper to a seven-column, four-page journal, but has also supplied syndicate matter in reference to the Essanay players and productions to a list of more than 400 daily and weekly newspapers seattered throughout the country, and within the next week or two has arranged to begin a series of beauty artieles by Miss Beverly Bayne, the popular Essanay leading lady, somewhat similar to the Lillian Russell department now appearing in the Chicago Tribune, for some 175 newspapers, who are members of the Newspaper Enterprise Asso-eiation. The popular Don attracted world-wide attention by his unique advertising campaign through the medium of the Alkali Ike dolls some months ago, and followed this up a few weeks later by composing and issuing to every exhibitor in the country, sheet musie of the Broncho Billy waltz, in which Harry Steek colloborated. Like many other dopesters, Mr. Meaney graduated into the film game from the newspaper ranks, having been with the New York Telegraph, the Billboard and the Chicago Examiner before joining the Essanay staff. It is understood that Don has a luerative position in sight with another motion pieture firm, but up to the hour of going to press, our most crafty interviewer was unable to obtain from him even an inkling as to its nature, though in an early issue we hope to make an announcement of exactly what Don's plans for the future are. The well known Vietor Eubank, long a member of the Chieago Press Club and with a large acquaintance in the newspaper fraternity, has been selected to fill the vacaney made by Mr. Meaney's resignation, and MOTOGRAPHY, in bidding Don farewell and good luck in whatever position he finally aeeepts, takes this opportunity of welcoming Mr. Eubank and wishing him the greatest suecess in popularizing Essanay films and players.

C. Alfred Karpen, he of the Eeleetie offiee, aceomplished two objects of note within the last two weeks. The first was his betrothal to Miss Jessie H. Christie of Brooklyn and the second was his seeuring a week's vacation—which in the film game is considered "some stunt." Mr. and Mrs. Karpen at once hurried into Woodstock, Ulster eounty, N. Y., where they visited the Christie summer home.

Mrs. Cora B. Metcalfe, mother of Earl Metcalfe of the Lubin stock eompany, died on June 21 following an operation at the Bethseda Hospital in Cincinnati. The funeral took place in Newport, Kentueky. Mr. Metcalfe has the sympathy of the entire Lubin studio.

Wilfred Buekland, artistie director with the Lasky Company, has eonstrueted a stockade at Hollywood, Cal., which Stuart Edward White, author of "The Call of the North," says is even more natural than the original, which formerly stood at Big Lake Tap, Canada, far north of the beaten trails.

The U. S. S. Delaware has purchased a Power's Cameragraph No. 6A motor drive projeeting machine and the U. S. Receiving Ship Hancock has installed a maehine of the same variety.

Rose Tapley, one of the Vitagraph players, was given a birthday surprise party on Tuesday, June 30th, when thirty of her friends and neighbors took her home in East Orange, N. J., by storm, decorated it from cellar to garret in yellow and green and gave the popular Vitagrapher one of the most enjoyable oeeasions imaginable.

Still they eome. Mona Darkfeather thought she had received the last of the drawings of Indian maidens executed by ehildren for prizes, when suddenly the foreign contingent commenced to arrive. They have come in hundreds from England, France, Italy, far off Africa and Australia. The judging day has been set for the fifteenth of July, and the popular aetress is greatly pleased by the number of children who showed interest in the competition.

William (Billy) Gittinger, who has been with the Universal a long time now, and who was for some time with Melies, is now a member of Harry Edwards eompany. He and Louise Glaum offer a big contrast; Bill is big and solemn, Louise is petite and full of fun, and she is constantly playing jokes on William who enjoys it all without retaliating. He says that sitting down on a pair of spurs may be humorous, but it has its disadvantages.

Myrtle Stedman is just learning to run her first car, and for a while it looked as though it might be her last, as her early attempts were quite spectacular and the neighbors really enjoyed it—from upper windows. The man next door refused to cateh his usual ear, as Myrtle and the machine were covering the street and he was not insured. However, she is getting the hang of it now, and the pussy eats and bowwows in the neighborhood are able to take day siestas once more.

The scenario for "The Rose of the Ranche," which is to be produced by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, Inc., was submitted to David Belasco this week. The cast and other details for the first Belasco picture are going forward rapidly.

The Army and Navy Y. M. C. A. of New York City has installed a Power's Cameragraph No. 6A motion pieture projecting maehine. This machine was sold by the Pieture Theater Equipment Company of that eity.

William Ellingford, an extra man in the employ of the Universal at the Hollywood studios, has just been notified that an eighth interest owned by him in a supposedly worthless mine is worth $120,000. He recently played the part of the father in Henry McRae's production of "The Danger Line."

The Grand Theater in San Franciseo features Margarita Fiseher and Harry Pollard in their "Beauty" produetions very largely. Some time baek when the Grand was the Mission Theater Miss Fiseher was a great favorite there, and the present manager displays one of her old posters with a notiee to the effect that her appearance there is but the renewal of old ties.

Getting up at 5 a. m., traveling fifty-seven miles in an auto, working hard until sundown, baek again and getting up a new scenario at night time, was the recent experienee of J. P. MeGowan and Helen Holmes in making a reeent oil pieture. As a side issue Miss Holmes had a real runaway when a spirited team of horses started down an ineline. MeGowan jumped on a horse and gave chase, but his leading woman pulled up just before he reached her, and a thrilling reseue was lost.

Vietor Johnson, he who so successfully handled the publieity and advertising for Warner's Features for many months, quietly slipped over to the offiees of The Morning Telegraph, recently and took over the duties and title of advertising manager of that paper's motion picture seetion. While in the employ of Warner's, Mr. Johnson exercised so eourteous a treatment of everybody with whom he came in contact, that now he is reaping the result of this method in the general eourtesy accorded him in his new work.

Agnes Egan Cobb has for the past week experieneed the great pleasure of being the exploiter of a film which has attained a popularity that is only given to exceptional produetions. "Germania" is the film, the product of the Leading Players' Film Company and Mrs. Cobb is its sales manager. It is by no means the first success that this company has been sponsor for, but it undoubtedly is the greatest of its releases. During the first night of its showing at the Strand theater, six hundred people packed the lobby and over-flowed onto the side-walk in patient waiting for the evening's first show to let out. The following nights and afternoons, the attendance was that of capacity at all performances.

Sydney Golden has acquired the presidency of the Crystal Film Company and Ben Goetz has mounted to a position of even more trust than he had formerly filled.

Francelia Billington is a dyed-in-the-wool kodak fiend. Not one of those who aimlessly snap everything on the horizon and closer, and sends the developer's bill to father —she develops her own negatives in a dark room fitted up at home, and has the walls of her room looking like a photograph gallery from the spoils of the chase. A generous part of Miss Billington's salary goes to the support of her camera, which is one of the most expensive on the market with all the latest improvements.

Sally Crute lately received a dozen American Beauty roses from a family in Washington, D. C. as a tribute to her acting in the Edison plays, "The Powers of the Air" and "The Song of Solomon." It is a common thing for photoplayers to receive notes complimenting them on their work, but a dozen roses accompanying said note is a sure sign that Miss Crute has made a "real hit."

In producing "The Old Derelict" at the Majestic studio an explosion was needed in one of the scenes so they just went to Topanga Canyon, planted the explosive and felt kind of triumphant about getting this realism in the picture when it was discovered that the dynamite had been placed near the intersection of a pipe line and that the damage for the mechanical devices destroyed amounted to $500. Without a murmur the Reliance and Majestic paid their bill the next day but in exchange had received a little knowledge about "look before you plant."

Lomond Ricalton, son of the explorer, James Ricalton, died in Nairobi, British East Africa, of typhoid-pneumonia on May 26. Ricalton and his son were under commission from Thomas A. Edison, Inc., to take pictures in foreign countries, and, having about finished their work were contemplating returning to America in October. The attack and development of the sickness was sudden, young Ricalton lingering but two weeks after being taken ill. He was twenty-four years old and a resident of Maplewood, N. J. The burial was in Nairobi.

Bliss Milford opened the Pathe-Edison ball game by tossing the ball to Augustus Phillips who has developed a mania for umpiring. Many of the popular stars of both companies were present. Pearl White further illustrated her powers of immortality by getting in and out of the way of a foul ball before its arrival, and then showed considerable wisdom by taking up her position in George Lessey's car where foul balls would be less likely to find her.

Ed Coxen's last visit to New York is the subject of a funny story some of his Eastern friends tell. It seems that, though having left Santa Barbara and come to New York in search of work, Coxen's only kind thoughts were of the paradise he had left. In fact, every good thing that could be said of the metropolis was buried under the scores of good points owned by the little Western city. One night as he was beginning to call the roll of Santa Barbara's attractions an inspiration seized him. He left his friends in the hotel lobby, rushed up-stairs and was down again in a few minutes laden with a suitcase. The next train west carried Coxen California-wards.

Carlyle Blackwell was present in the Famous Players' projection room when they ran off "The Spitfire" in which Blackwell played the lead. In one of the scenes there was a fight in which his pajamas, which by the way did not register the silk of which they were made, were considerably torn and his opponent considerably choked. Blackwell's side of the affair was most heroic but this did not shield him in any way from the many remarks which were thrown his way about his blood-thirsty instinct and ungentlemanly manner.

Walter Long of the Reliance company has learned that make-ups are for studio use only and not for street dress, especially that used in the portrayal of a yeggman. He was playing "Chicago Red" in the detective drama "Blue Pete's Escape," and when intermission was called for lunch during the making of the scenes in Santa Monica he wandered off by himself in search of a restaurant. His make-up alone was evidence enough for a life sentence, and when he walked into a lunch room the proprietor refused to serve him taking offense at having his bill-of-fare imposed on by such a rough looking character. Long went to leave but was met at the door by a policeman who would have arrested him had he not explained the reason for his "hard looking" appearance. The proprietor, now convinced that the "crook" was a respectable one allowed him to eat in peace.

Rhea Mitchell's success in Kay Bee, Broncho, and Domino northern pictures is largely due to the fact that she takes pleasure in the sports and hardships of the cold, brisk "outdoors." She is never more at home than when, dressed for weather, she goes tobogganing behind a bunch of shaggy sledge-dogs, snow-shoeing over the sparkling crust, or skeeing in the timber forests—all of which is being caught by the camera.

Harry Eytinge and Charles M. Seay were partners in a scheme a few weeks ago whereby the unsuspecting public at Coney Island was deprived of their usual pleasure of spoiling a good picture just to be sure that they got in it. Eytinge's part in the affair was carried out in good faith—he didn't know that the camera that was supposed to be registering his rough-and-tumble work with ash barrels and his many rolls in the mud was only a "dummy," and that he was only holding the crowd's attention while a picture was being taken in another part of the grounds. It didn't take him long to wake up, however, when he was told that he could quit now and had better rest up so that he could do it again in the afternoon. But then he really didn't care as long as Seay got a good picture—it was all for Edison films.

Hunter Bennett, assistant to the general manager of the World Film Corporation, has had a meteoric rise in the film industry. Seven months ago Mr. Bennett was made general manager of the New Orleans office of the World Film Corporation. His capacity for getting business was so great that he was soon relieved of the duties of office manager and made special road representative. He continued his good work in this capacity making bad territory rich in results, and as a reward, was promoted to his present position. Mr. Bennett is known from coast to coast, having friends in every city. He has been advance agent for road attractions and press representative for several amusement attractions. At one time he handled the press work for Bernard MacFadden, the renowned physical culturist. With great success he is handling the affairs of the managers of the World Film Corporation. Mr. Bennett leaves on Wednesday for a two months' trip over the circuit, going as far as the coast. His energy and ability are bound to leave their effect on the managers throughout the entire circuit.

ROLL OF STATES

ARKANSAS.

Work is progressing rapidly on the airdome being erected by R. D. Dunlap, in Clarksville and which will be leased to Laser Brothers, the present managers of the Dunlay theater.

CALIFORNIA.

Mr. Tally will open another Broadway moving picture theater in a short time. The theater, which will be known as the Palace and seat 500, is located in the Forrester Building, at 642 South Broadway, Los Angeles.

Thirty millions of dollars will be expended by the Pathe Motion Picture company in the building of magnificent motion picture houses in Los Angeles and other principal American cities. The news of the proposed expenditure of millions came direct from the main offices of the Pathe company in New York. It is promised within six months Los Angeles will have some of the finest moving pictures in the world.

FLORIDA.

A permit was recently issued to Buckland & Fitchner, contractors, for the remodeling of the three-story brick building at 40 West Forsyth street, Jacksonville, for the Public Theater Company. It will be a moving picture theater seating 900, and the estimated cost is given as $20,000.

ILLINOIS.

The new Orpheum theater, Water and Main streets, Aurora, will be opened shortly. Harry Hargrave is owner and manager of the new amusement house.

The Village theater in Wilmette, under the management of A. L. Sparr was recently opened.

Grice and Stassen have opened a moving picture theater in the Fred Carsten building in Peotone.

H. D. Wagner has sold the Idle Hour picture theater in Hinckley to F. J. Kroulick of Chicago.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believoing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in MOTOGRAPHY as they may be obtained of the manufaeturers.

The Divine Shakespearean Drama

MADE AT VENICE, ITALY!!!

By the Photo Drama Company. THE SUPER FILM — By All Odds the Most Pretentious, Beautiful and Accurately Screened Version of Shakespearean Stories.

MADE AT VENICE, ITALY! That's a Tremendous Advertising Feature in Itself. VENICE, rendesvouz of the modern tourist—a very fountain-head of Romance and Adventure! The waterways of Historic Venice with its tales, ten centuries old, of Passionate Loves and Fierce Vendettas — the indolent, dreamy sweep of these Gondola-ridden highways are scenes of the quaintest stories in any language.

FOR THE MAKING OF OTHELLO the City Fathers Declared a Half-Holiday— Canals were Closed to Modern Commerce, Leaving Only the Aged Palaces, the Gayly Costumed Players and the Clicking Cameras of the Photo Drama Company.

In OTHELLO, we offer a real masterpiece—it is the first of Shakespeare's stories filmed in its proper environment, as the Master would have wished.

Bushman Stars In American Hero Role

"One Wonderful Night."

THE choice of Francis X. Bushman, by the readers of the Ladies World, to play the title role in the screen version of "One Wonderful Night," which was run serially by that magazine, was a happy one, for never before during his successful career in the photo-drama has the popular star been seen to better advantage than in this picture.

Curtis quiets the threats of Count Vassilan.

The play, which it is said is eagerly awaited by ten million people, will be released by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company through the General Film Company's Feature Department on Saturday, July 18, and it is safe to say that those who have followed the original story, which was written by Louis Tracy, will be more than delighted with the screen play and its charming hero, while many who have taken but a mild interest in it will be held enthralled when it is presented at their favorite picture house instead of merely in cold type.

Mr. Bushman's delineation of the leading character, that of John Delancey Curtis, "the typical American hero," can be described by only one word which will cover it adequately—Great. The role fits him perfectly and had the story been written especially to play up the numerous strong points in his expressions and actions it could not have presented him to any better advantage. His acting is romantic throughout but at the same time appealing and perfectly natural. He has appreciated and depicted to the fullest extent the many ups and downs of the character which the vast army of picture fans throughout the country selected him to portray.

Next in the "praiseworthy line" and standing close to Mr. Bushman is E. H. Calvert, who not only directed the picture in a masterful manner but also plays the role of a police detective and from rather scant material makes a character which appears to live. The work of Beverly Bayne as the charming heroine is fitting in all ways to that of the man she plays opposite and she and Mr. Bushman carry on the love affair of their characters in an extremely appealing way.

The work of Bryant Washburn, Harry Mainhall and Leo White attracts more attention than any of the others in the supporting cast as they are well in the foreground most of the time and because all handle their roles with life-like naturalness. Messrs. White and Mainhall furnish considerable amusement in the scenes where the latter, as a detective, goes to get the former, as a fussy count for whom he has no use.

Misses Lillian Drew and Helen Dunbar do very good work in their roles but are hampered by lack of "business" and the others who complete the cast, including Thomas Commerford, Rapley Holmes and Edward Babille as the plotting foreigners and Howard Watrous, John H. Cossar, Charles Hitchcock, M. C. Von Betz and Robert Bolder all do work which fits nicely into the general high quality of the entire production.

The settings will cause no little comment among those who view the film as they are truly artistic. The interior of the hotel comes close to being a masterpiece as far this company's interiors go. It surely is gorgeous. The exteriors taken on Broadway and on Fifth avenue, New York City, and the setting of the pursuit of the crooks in an auto along Riverside Drive, with the Palisades of the Hudson River in the background will hold the interest of the most languid. There are also many views of New York harbor which, although somewhat uneven on account of the rocking of the boat from which they were taken, are none the less attractive. The other interiors are all properly set and decorated, the atmosphere of the Bowery being especially good.

The photography is remarkable, considering the fact that in practically all the exterior scene tinting was necessary to produce the "night" effect. In this respect it must have been a very difficult picture to handle and the men who are responsible for this end of it have every reason to feel proud of their work.

All the action of the story is supposed to have taken place within eight hours on the "one wonderful night" and the leaders which are flashed on the screen as the play progresses chronicle the hours as they pass. A feature which will probably prove of more than ordinary interest from the "thrill" point of view is the dropping of an automobile over a cliff.

The story itself is big and gripping and though it neglects to give several of the characters a chance to develop, it more than makes up for this in the action which surrounds the principals.

The situation which is first disclosed is the plight of Lady Hermione, who has fled from her European home to avoid marrying a count whom her father had selected to be her husband. Many years before, when Lady Hermione was a little girl, her mother, who was very wealthy, had died, leaving all her estate to her little daughter, and giving her husband the Earl of Valletort, who had always been a worthless fellow, only enough to live on.

As Lady Hermione grew to womanhood her father, the earl, sought continually to secure her fortune without success. At last the earl, desperate for want of money, met a Frenchman, Count Vassilan, who was equally short of funds and the two formed a plot whereby the earl would force Lady Hermione to marry the count and the latter would then turn part of the girl's fortune over to her worthless father. Lady Hermione, however, had no use for Count Vassilan and refused to do as her father bid her, as she considered marriage to a man she hated unjust. She fled, therefore, to America and hired another Frenchman named Jean de Courtois, who unknown to her was also employed by her father, to marry her and protect her with his name only and later secure a divorce.

The date of their marriage had been set for the evening of the day on which John Delancey Curtis, an American engineer who for several years had been engaged in building railroads through China was scheduled to arrive in New York City and though neither of them had ever heard of the other. Fate decreed that they should meet on this night.

De Courtois, acting under the orders of the Earl of Valletort, tries in every possible manner to delay his wedding to Lady Hermione but Hunter, a newspaper reporter who has not been making good with his editor is told to get a big story at once or resign and as he knows of the coming marriage he determines to force it at once and get the story. He knows facts regarding the count's past which the latter is very anxious to conceal and therefore has little difficulty in making the count agree to an immediate ceremony. However, they find that in some manner the marriage certificate has been lost and the count believes he sees an excuse to delay the marriage, but the aggressive Hunter kills this hope when he states he will go to the license clerk, get a duplicate license and return within a short time.

De Courtois agrees to this but at once gets in touch with Lamotte, a crook who is also employed by the earl, and his two villianous assistants who agree to dispose of Hunter for the evening. Meanwhile the boat on which the earl and Count Vassilan are speeding toward the United States, is disabled and they send a wireless message for a private yacht to carry them to shore.

John Delancey Curtis and his friend Howard Devar arrive in port after their long ocean trip and both register at the Central Hotel, which is the one at which De Courtois is stopping. Out in the ocean the earl fears that De Courtois may marry Lady Hermione despite his orders not to, and that the best thing to do with him is to get him out of the way. He therefore sends a wireless to Lamotte telling them to detain the Frenchman. The crooks bind and gag De Courtois and, leaving him in his room, set out to capture Hunter, the only other person who knows about the wedding.

As his "one wonderful night" begins Curtis leaves his hotel and strolls out in the dazzling city with a keen enjoyment of it all after his long period of solitude in the heathen country. His joy is short lived however for the cyclone of events which Fate has chosen to engulf him with at once sweep down upon him and as he walks along the street he sees Hunter shot down by Lamotte and his men as he returns with the marriage license. Though the crooks had only intended to render the reporter unconscious they realize that they have killed him and flee in terror. Curtis is the only witness of the crime and notifies the police and in so doing meets Steingall, the chief of the detectives. He is told to appear at the inquest in the morning.

Trying to dismiss the thought of the happening Curtis seeks Broadway and as he strolls along he discovers he is wearing the coat of the dead man, which he exchanged for his own in the mix-up. In the pocket is the marriage license made out to Lady Hermione and Jean De Curtois. Curtis' spirit of adventure is aroused and he determines to seek Lady Hermione and learn more of the affair. As he goes to her home he realizes that the dead man must have been her fiancee. At the waterfront the private yacht bearing her father and count Vassilan arrives and they at once start a search for her.

At the apartment of Lady Hermione Curtis learns that his errand is not as sad as he had first expected and that De Curtois was merely to protect her with his name. He also falls desperately in love with the fair lady the moment he sees her and she is greatly attracted to him. he tells her that the only way out of her difficulty is to marry him at once and after hesitating a moment she agrees, as she knows if she does not she will be forced to marry Vassilan.

They hurry to a minister where the ceremony is performed and just as they are leaving the earl and the count dash up and demand that Lady Hermione at once join them. Curtis for the first time uses his power to protect his wife and knocks the count to the ground. The bridal couple then make their escape.

Curtis' coat, found near the scene of the murder, puzzles Steingall, as he is certain that the young engineer is not implicated. However, he decides to follow the clue to the end and meets Curtis and his bride when they return to the hotel. Curtis' parents also arrive in the city and meet him at the hotel, where he introduces them to his wife. Events then start to happen in quick succession. Curtis is suspected by Steingall and accused by Count Vassilan and the earl who follows him to the hotel, and De Curtois is found in his room. Steingall's suspicion of Curtis dies quickly and he believes that there are other criminals who have not yet been heard from. His assistant Clancy proves a valuable aid to him at this point and follows Vassilan, when the latter goes to the den of Lamotte to inquire about the murder.

At the request of Curtis nothing is said to his wife about finding of De Curtois, as he believes she has had enough excitement during the early part of the evening. Devar again meets Curtis and together with Steingall and Curtis they go to the Bowery, where, in a free-for-all fight, they capture two of the crooks and secure evidence which will send them over the road for the murder of Hunter. Lamotte, however, escapes and Devar and Curtis take up the pusuit and follow him through the streets of New York and along Riverside Drive, finally capturing him through the assistance of a loiterer.

An attempt on the part of the earl and the count to have Curtis arrested for the abduction of Lady Hermione is foiled by Steingall and the crooked noblemen then resort to tricky work and tell Curtis' wife that he tricked her into marrying him and that De Curtois still lives. Angered, she leaves the hotel and seeks other quarters, determined she shall never see the man who deceived her again.

As the dawn of the "wonderful night" approaches Curtis returns to the apartments, longing to see again the woman he loves, but finds that she has gone. He is thunderstruck and is undecided as to his next move, though he determines he shall find her and tell her of his love for her regardless of all obstacles. The hopelessness of his task, however, presents itself and he realizes he has little chance of ever meeting her again in the great city. Steingall, however, proves a friend in need and locates Mrs. Curtis. He tells her that it was because her husband wished to save her from excitement that he kept the finding of De Curtois from her. Slowly she realizes his true character and discovers that she wants the man who so suddenly came into her life and claimed her heart, so she determines to return to him.

And as the sun peeps over the horizon, announcing the end of "one wonderful night" the entire party who have been so strangely brought together are found seated around the table in the apartment of Mr. and Mrs. Curtis, enjoying the wedding breakfast and the earl, Count Vassilan and De Curtois are on their way back to Europe with a warning from Steingall, that if they ever appear in New York again he will arrest all of them, ringing in their ears.

Carlyle Blackwell Leaves

Carlyle Blackwell.

Carlyle Blackwell, the popular photoplay star, has recently been supplying the trade with a quantity of news but his most surprising venture was disclosed this week when it transpired that he had left the Famous Players Company to manufacture his own brand of film. About three months ago, Carlyle Blackwell, one of the most prominent and popular film stars in America, left the Kalem Company with whom he had been associated for over three years, to go with the Famous Players, in whose current release "The Spit-Fire" he starred. This picture has made a decided success and was received by the trade, press critics and the publisher with great enthusiasm. Mr. Blackwell intends to produce a three reel feature once a month, himself in the leading role. The subjects that he will produce will be well-known works of famous authors. He has very big plans in connection with his newly formed producing company which will be announced shortly. Mr. Blackwell will leave about the eighteenth of this month for his studio, which is now in course of construction at Los Angeles, California. He will travel by motor and stop long enough in the largest cities to say a few words to his many admirers.

Mr. Blackwell's productions will be released through the newly formed Alco Film Company of which Al. Lichtman, former sales manager of the Famous Players, is president and general manager. Mr. Lichtman has big plans for the Alco Company and will shortly announce his new policy by distributing quality films throughout the world.

Heart Interest in Ideal Film

A three part drama, "The Crucible of Flame" is one of the late Features Ideal productions. The story is a heart interest one, with plenty of action to emphasize it. The theme has formed the basis for many books, plays and photoplays and is still new, which is probably because it is taken from life and therefore does not grow old.

Considerable care and a broad knowledge of drama is seen in the construction of the settings and the arrangement of the incidents which bring out the object lesson clearly and strongly, and still leaves it well supported by an interesting chain of events.

The story is of a girl, Irene Ruggers, who lives a peaceful and quiet life in a small town with her father and but one friend. To both of these she is devoted, until one day her former school chum, Agnes Dely, now an actress, calls on her and gets her to consent to visit with her in the city.

Irene Ruggers returns home married and incurs the displeasure of her father who banishes her from home. A year later she again calls on her father to plead with him, but to no purpose. Irene leaves her baby on the steps, where it is later found by Mr. Ruggers and is raised as his own son.

Six years pass. Mr. Ruggers has become greatly attached to his grandchild. Irene has become a school mistress for poor children. A fire breaks out in the school and Irene distinguishes herself by her bravery. Mr. Ruggers visits her in the hospital and they become reconciliated. Meanwhile Irene's former husband has demanded money from her father, on account of his legal right to the boy. Some of his friends kidnap the child and think to hold it for ransom, but he, stirred by paternal love, tries to find his boy, but without success. In the meantime the child has freed himself and returned. When Mr. Ruggers sees a figure climbing over the gate he shoots, but instead of killing a thief he kills the boy's father. Irene is now free to marry the doctor who has remained loyal through it all.

"Big Six" For Pics

The diamond king in action.

Christy Matthewson, "Big Six" of New York Giants and the world's most famous baseball pitcher, has signed with the Universal to appear exclusively in a series of comedies and dramas and the camera is expected to give an intimate study of Matty never had before. The pictures will carry out logical stories, written to amuse and grip, with "Matty" playing the lead. It is said that Matty will write some of his own scenarios. Incidentally, he will receive for his services upon the screen such a bunch of money that it would make you gasp if we even whispered it.

Woman's Love Won By Disregard

Clubmen Prove Theory

WITH superb settings and a background of charming players "A Five Hundred Dollar Kiss," which is to be released by the Selig Polyscope Company July 27, promises to be greatly in demand, as it is one of the "quiet" style of comedies which are so little seen and so largely demanded. It bubbles with real humor and appealing human interest from the opening scene to the final one and never once is the general trend of the story lost sight of, even for an instant. The author of the scenario has succeeded in bringing out his main theme—that a woman can be won more easily by disregarding her than by any other method—with great strength, and at the close of the picture there can be but one impression left on the minds of those who see it.

Harry avoids meeting the flirt.

Miss Renee Kelly, a recent recruit from the dramatic stage is featured in the production and makes a bewitching flirt, who cares nothing for the attentions of her countless suitors, but who is forced to bow to the man who loves her but does not let her know it. The other important roles in the cast, played by Maxwell Sargeant, Harold Vosburgh and Hilton Allen, furnish most of the humor with their efforts to win a wager of $500 that they will not receive the flirt's kiss of love within a specified time. Their acting is natural and many situations which threaten to become listless are saved by their clever work.

The settings are delightfully chosen and photographed. Several scenes are taken in a conservatory and the floral background in all of them is used to great advantage. A ball room set of large dimensions is very attractive, as are the many rooms and nooks about the Country Club.

A large number of supernumeraries are used, but at no time do they take the center of the stage and therefore do not in any manner hamper the development of the plot.

The flirt falls in love with Harry.

The opening scenes of the story take place about the grounds of a country club where Vivian Swift, a thoughtless and light-hearted flirt, is enjoying herself immensely by forcing one after another of the clubmen to fall in love with her and then tossing them off. She is not bad at heart and does not believe that the men take the matter quite as seriously as they do. It is all a joke to her, and she immensely enjoys seeing the expressions on their faces when she starts to walk with two of them and allows two more to come along and take her away from the first pair. She has not yet learned the meaning of the word love as she has never met a man she cares for except as a plaything.

Tom, Dick and Harry, three of the most popular members of the club, return from Europe about this time and are told by their friends of the manner in which Vivian has been playing the game of hearts. The new arrivals have little or no use for the opposite sex and determine that this girl deserves to be taught a lesson, so they declare they will break her heart. The clubmen who have fallen victim to her do not believe this can be done and a wager of $500 is made that neither Tom, Dick nor Harry can secure a love-kiss from Vivian within three weeks, each of the women-haters to be allowed a week in which to try.

Two other members of the club, one of whom is a minister, are selected to act as judges, and it becomes their duty to follow the contestants around continually to be on the spot in case any of them secured the desired kiss. Tom is the first to try to win the wager. His theory is all that all women will love the man who flatters them. It is an expensive course, as candy and flowers in great quantities are absolutely necessary. He exhausts his vocabulary in saying nice things to her, much to the amusement of the judges, but when the end of the week approaches and he tries to claim his kiss he finds that his plan has failed him completely and is thunderstruck when she indignantly repulses him. He quits in disgust.

Dick is next in line. He greatly enjoys Tom's failure and says that his friend was all wrong in his theory and that the only manner in which a woman can be won is by securing her sympathy. His week is a busy one, in which he manages to fall gently from his horse and appear to be injured; allows himself to be disinherited (with the help of a friend who writes the letter which seals his doom); and last of all, commits suicide by pouring red liquid over his shirt front and firing a gun in the air. All of these things mildly arouse Vivian's sympathy, but when she discovers what a fake Dick really is she says she will have nothing more to do with him. His week is at an end and the judges go to Harry and tell him it is now up to him to win the wager, as both of his friends have failed.

Harry knows he has a hard fight before him as he has secretly fallen in love wtih Vivian from afar, but he feels that the only course to take is to treat her with complete indifference. He adopts this policy and it is not long before she realizes that he is the one man at the club who is different from all the rest inasmuch as he pays no attention to her. Her pride is hurt and she determines to make his acquaintance. She follows him everywhere seeking an introduction and finally secures one on the tennis court and at once invites him to her home for a bridge party.

He accepts the invitation and when they are alone at the party he continually fights to master himself and keep from telling her how much he loves her, for he knows this would place him on a plane with her other victims. He conquers himself, however, and treats her with indifference time and again and she determines that he is the one man she can love.

She coaxes him into taking her for a canoe ride the next day and, when they are in the little craft, shows him in every way that she loves him. He again proves master of himself and refuses to show any sign of the great love he feels for her. A storm comes up while they are on the lake and they rush to shore, arriving at the hut of a fisherman, where the two judges, ever watchful, have sought protection from the rain. Harry takes his coat off and puts it on Vivian. As his arms circle her shoulders he loses his self-restraint and gathers her in his embrace. Happily, she places her arms about his neck and their lips meet in the "five-hundred-dollar kiss." The judges promptly appear and hand the reward to Harry, but he tosses it aside and forces the minister to perform the marriage ceremony with Tom and Dick, who happen to be passing on their way home, as witnesses.

Weakling Gains Manhood in the West

Wheeler Oakman Featured

THE work of Wheeler Oakman as a sissified and greatly humored young man in "Willie," the Selig Polyscope Company's release of August 10 is one of the best bits of character work this player has done for some time and incidentally requires him to go through several rough and tumble adventures which are anything but tame.

He stands practically alone, so far as the action of the play goes, for every incident and situation revolves around him, the other characters merely acting as assistant fun makers, each in their turn. While the character he portrays is of the type which the picture fans generally like to see "get it," Mr. Oakman has played it with so much feeling that at the point where the weakling becomes a man he will probably have the majority of any audience "with him."

The support accorded the leading character is very good and the orderly manner in which the band of cowboys do their work speaks well for the director who handled them. The settings are very pretty and the photography is clear and even.

The story opens as the love affair between Willie, a sissified and much pampered boy, and his sweetheart reaches a climax and the girl urges her lover to ask her father for her hand. The young man, however, has not nerve enough and weakly lets things go on as they are.

Willie's father entertains an old friend from the West, Jim Rucker by name, who is an ideal specimen of the rugged western type of "rough and ready" man. Rucker is greatly amused by the actions of Willie and when the two shake hands he purposely gives the puny boy a squeeze that doubles him up.

Willie's first appearance as a cowboy.

Willie's feelings are hurt and he believes that all the world has turned against him when his sweetheart says that he must either ask her father or never see her again. He finally gets nerve enough to put the matter up to her father, but he tells him that he is not capable of supporting a wife and advises him to go West and grow up with the country.

The idea sounds very romantic to Willie and he at once rushes to Rucker, his father's friend, and makes arrangements to return to his ranch with him. The day he leaves Willie calls on his sweetheart, and although she has grown tired of his womanish actions, she gives him a flower to remember her by and tells him if he is a real man when he returns she will marry him.

When Rucker and Willie arrive in the West the gentle eastern boy finds that a warm reception awaits him as the cowboys have been instructed by wire to handle him in anything but a gentle manner. His dress gets on their nerves and when they see him powdering his face before going to bed it proves too much, and so, with Rucker's permission, they drag him out into the corrall and toss him up and down in a blanket.

This difficulty is a minor one compared to his first lesson in riding horses that are inclined to be wild. The cowboys are not the least bit considerate of Willie's feelings and allow him to be thrown from unbroken horses with the least show of feeling. Willie is very downhearted and the only thing he has to console him is the flower which his sweetheart gave him before he left home. This he guards as his one treasure and though he is not man enough as yet to defend himself against the torments of the cowboys, still he is slowly growing out of the habits which have made him a weakling and is beginning to show signs that indicate he is learning to take care of himself.

The turning point is reached one day when the ranch cook discovers the flower and destroys it. It is the most sacred thing in Willie's life and he proceeds to show the astonished cook that he cannot trifle with him in such matters. Having disposed of one of his tormentors Willie becomes a two-gun man and rounds up the other cowboys on the ranch and has them all bowing before him in no time.

He learns to handle horses in a masterful manner and when he is thoroughly toughened up he decides to re-visit his home. He returns to his sweetheart and his style of making love is now far different from the timid manner in which he used to act and he sweeps them all off their feet with his breezy manner. His name is no longer Willie, he informs them, for the cowboys have christened him Bill. His vacation in the East is only a short one, as Rucker telegraphs him that he cannot afford to be without his services another moment, and Bill and his sweetheart plan an immediate marriage and a honeymoon on the ranch.

The cast for the production is as follows:

Willie.....Wheeler Oakman
His Dad.....Fred Huntly
His Girl.....Gertrude Ryan
His Girl's Father.....George Hernandez
Jim Rucker.....Frank Clark

Much Realism in Lubin Picture

In Lubin's photoplay entitled "Three Men and a Woman" a yacht was needed and George Terwilliger, the director, purchased the well known Herreshoff model called "The Cosette." It is supposed to take fire and the seamen desert in a panic, leaving Kempton Greene, Earle Metcalfe and Anna Luther on board. Greene (in the play) shows the yellow streak and jumps for the boat being lowered by the crew. He misses the boat and struggles in the water hanging on to a piece of wreckage. While the boat load of sailors pulls away, Metcalfe throws the yacht raft overboard and with Miss Luther, who is unconscious, jumps into the sea. Greene fights for the raft but Metcalfe beats him off and saves the girl. Greene is presumably drowned and the yacht burns until a boiler explosion takes it to the bottom. It was an expensive "stunt" and was pretty tough on Kempton Greene, but he worked as usual the next day.

First Regent Release

"La Belle Rousse" is the name of the first release of the Regent Feature Film Company which was shown to the press and players at the Atsco projection room Tuesday, July 7. The film is in five parts and is the screen version of David Belasco's play of the same name. Evelyn Russel plays the lead in the dual role of the twin sisters, Geraldine and Beatrice Hatherly. The part is cleverly handled and directed; for at no time does the story necessitate their appearing in the scenes at the same time though that effect is obtained in the climax when it is proved that Beatrice is impersonating Geraldine.

The lead opposite Miss Russel is well played by Frank Wood in the role of Robert St. Omer, a young, impulsive Frenchman, whose wife turns out to be unworthy of him, but whose conduct even when his fondest hopes are blighted, denotes good breeding and strong character. The rest of the cast follows: Laurence Gordon as Philip Calthorpe; Harry Knowles as Renard Duval; Mary Stewart as Lady Calthorpe; Irene Warren as Marcel Chester; and the talented little Bertha Kirkstein as Little Beatrice.

William J. Hanley staged the film and is also managing its release and distribution. The exterior scenes were taken in New Rochelle and City Island. The plot of the story is laid principally in Paris and London, and the settings and scenes are in accordance with the surroundings and interiors of the residences of those cities. The photography is of high quality.

The story opens with Beatrice Hatherly's leaving home in obedience to a foolish impulse. She returns for forgiveness but is disowned by her father and goes out to work her own way. She falls in with some people who run a society gambling house, and is attracted by the blinding glitter of the extravagant life. She becomes known as La Belle Rousse of the card parlors. She meets Robert St. Omer who falls in love with her. A few years after their marriage she deserts him, and St. Omer leaves their child in care of a convent and plans to leave the country.

In the meantime Beatrice's twin sister, Geraldine, has been married to a young nobleman, Philip Calthorpe. Lady Calthorpe cuts off her son's allowance for marrying beneath his station and in despair, unable to find work he goes to join the army. Near the recruting station he meets St. Omer and they enlist together and are detailed in East Indian service.

Several years pass and Lady Calthorpe repents her severity and advertises for her son's wife. Geraldine is in the hospital and, fearing death, writes her sister a farewell letter. Beatrice sees the advertisement and representing herself as her sister visits Lady Calthorpe and is accepted as her son's wife. Even Philip, himself, returning from India believes she is his wife. But his companion, St. Omer, recognizes in her his own wife. He accuses her of duplicity but is stopped by Philip, who thinks he is defending his wife.

Well again, Geraldine hears of the advertisement, consults a lawyer and is taken at once to the Calthorpe mansion where she awakens Philip to his mistake. A happy reunion takes place between Philip and his wife, but Beatrice is ordered from the house by her husband, the child remaining with St. Omer.

New Company Completes First Picture

Without the usual clamor which accompanies the entree of a feature company into the producing field, the United Keanograph Film Manufacturing Company has slipped into the fold and, taking the trade off its guard by announcing the completion of its first subject, an eight-reel feature, calmly states that it is equipped to continue the production of these colossal subjects and points to a model studio in Fairfax, Cal., as mute evidence of what it has accomplished since the first of the year.

The quiet but positive manner in which this company was launched is charateristic of its president and general manager, James Keane. The first performance of the new picture, which has not as yet been titled, will be given in San Francisco this week, after which Mr. Keane and Sol Lesser, general manager of the Golgate Feature Service, will probably leave for New York.

The identities of the actors, actresses and director have not been made known, but it is said that the cast includes several players whose names are familiar to those interested in pictures and that there are over 2,000 people playing extra roles.

"Judge Not" Through General Film

"Judge Not," a remarkable four-part Kleine-Cines, is scheduled for release through the special feature department of the General Film Company early in September. This is the detective story which created such a furore in Europe recently. The plot centers about a prosecuting attorney, subject to spells of temporary mental aberration. In such a moment he murders his dearest friend, a judge, and then tries an innocent man for the deed. How a scientist untangles the skeins of destiny, brings back memory and establishes to the prosecuting attorney unquestioned proof of the latter's guilt, makes a story highly scientific and conspicuous for its dramatic situations and swift action.

George Field and Winnifred Greenwood (Mrs. George Field) of the American Company met with painful injuries a week ago Sunday when a motorcycle on which they were riding skidded and threw them to the ground. Miss Greenwood was cast for the lead in "Lodgings for a Night" which was ready for production at the time but was forced to rest a few days and Miss Charlotte Burton assumed her role.

Two Thrilling Eclectic Productions

Pauline as Actress

PAULINE has become an actress! This is not meant in any way to reflect on Pearl White's past, but is just one of the new complications developed in the ninth episode of "The Perils of Pauline."

This is probably the most startling release yet made; not only because of the unique turn which has been taken by Pauline in her search of adventure, but also on account of the thrills and situations which it contains.

A few new players have been introduced into the cast bringing with them some commendable touches of comedy. The combination of the humorous and thrilling situations, the quickened action, the increased company, and the excellent photography have put new life into the picture and made this one of the most interesting of any of the episodes thus far.

In the first reel Pauline is tempted to join a motion picture company and, looking forward to a novel experience, applies at the Pathe Freres studio for a position.

Pauline applies for a position as a screen actress.

She is accepted and placed in the cast of "Paradise Lost" in the role of an angel. Owen also applies and is hired as one of the lost souls. Harry is unable to accompany Pauline to Devil Island, where the scenes are being staged, but agrees to meet her there as soon as possible.

When Harry attempts to sail to the island he is informed that the regular ferry is out of commission, and that the only way of reaching there is by boat. Harry makes arrangements to motor over, but Hicks, following Owen's instructions, manages to have the owner maroon Harry and his companion on a barren island. In the meantime, a queer, self important fellow named Booth, who is playing the role of one of the devils, has taken a liking to Pauline, much to her disgust, and, on his attempting to win his suit by force, she repulses him. Owen arrives on the scene and makes great pretense of being enraged by the insult. Later he meets Booth and offers him a large sum of money to kidnap Pauline.

Harry and his friend, as soon as they learn of the trick played on them, build a raft and start for the mainland. Their supply of water gives out and they drink some whiskey which Harry has brought with him in a flask. Spying land at some distance they swim to the shore, but immediately wish they hadn't. There, a short distance from shore, they see numerous angels and devils. Thinking it a vision they flee into the woods and come upon a devil threatening an angel whom Harry recognizes as Pauline. Harry engages the devil in a fight and Pauline escapes.

Tired of her short experience as an actress, Pauline seeks a way to leave the island and is rewarded by the appearance of an approaching aeroplane. She arranges with the pilot to be taken to the mainland and climbing into the machine starts on the journey through the air.

blaze. The pilot seizes the only parachute and, unable to guide his course, drops in front of a speeding train which grinds him to atoms. Pauline manages to right the wings and volplanes to the ground, which is the shore of the island she has just left.

Her recent experiences impress her as too dangerous for repetition, and she promises Harry not to get mixed up in another adventure, but her nature is too vivacious to permit this and the next episode will doubtless be as full of hazardous undertakings as this one.

THE Eclectic Film Company seems to have an unlimited supply of good multiple reel features. One of these, which will be released about the middle of July, is a six-part story of the French Revolution entitled "The Reign of Terror." Probably one of the most pathetic and unjust incidents of this blackest period of French history is the imprisonment and execution of the noble queen, Marie Antoinette.

The picture is a dramatization of Alexander Dumas' novel, "The Chevalier de Maison Rouge," and, while being historically authentic, still contains enough of that adventurous and romantic spirit to hold one's undivided attention throughout the whole six reels, without losing the identity of the important characters around whom the story is woven.

At no time during the film do any of the cast seem conscious of the camera; an unusual thing considering the large company used. The important roles, it is plainly evident, are played by veterans in the dramatic art. A master hand at production is seen in the successful directing of a cast as large and varied as this. Clear, even photography is one of the assets of the picture, the scenes of which are nearly all interiors the majority being those of the prison.

The story begins with Queen Marie Antoinette's life in prison. Despite the fact that the gentlemanly officers in charge of the prison spare her all the unpleasantness possible, she is continually bothered and insulted by the ruffianly guards.

Dixmer is well known as having Revolutionist sympathies, but secretly he is in league with his brother, the Chevalier de Maison Rouge, to effect the escape of the queen. A small number of loyalists group together and start work on a tunnel which begins in the cellar of Dixmer's house and comes up under the prison. The work is carried on with the utmost secrecy for some time, until nearly finished; then comes the time to plan for the queen's escape. The chevalier proposes to Dixmer that they make the most of the friendship betwen Dixmer's wife and one of the prison officers. His patriotism getting the best of his jealousy, Dixmer consents and out lines a plan which his wife is to follow.

As a result the queen is allowed to walk in the prison grounds, and receives a bouquet from a sympathetic visitor which informs her of the progress made for her escape and instructs her how to co-operate with the chevalier's band. The note is discovered by the prison guards and the attempt to rescue her is a failure.

To prevent further trouble the queen is removed to a distant prison. Here another rescue attempt is made, the warden overpowered, and Dixmer's wife substituted in the queen's place. When nearly successful the plans are overturned by the arrival of one of the queen's former guards. By tribunal the queen is ordered executed at once, and Dixmer's wife put in the common prison together with the young officer who had unwittingly paved the way for the first attempt to rescue the queen.

The unfortunate pair are sentenced to death, and while awaiting their turn to ride in the open carts, through a jeering mob, to the place of execution, are visited by a friend of the officer's, a young man who stands high in the councils of the Revolutionists. He gives them passes which he has illegally secured, and, while the now happy pair make their way out of the grim death-house he calmly awaits his punishment for this act of treason.

As the subtitle flashes the words "Greater love hath no man than he——" the arrival of an open cart outside the prison gates, and its accompanying mob yelling, gestulating Revolutionist citizens make unnecessary the rest of the quotation, "who lays down his life for his friend."

Animated Weekly Staff Busy

In the past few months the Universal Animated Weekly is said to have been developed to a degree of thoroughness and efficiency never before equaled in the history of news-pictorial service. A considerable amount of credit for this is due to Jack Cohn, editor and manager of the Animated, with offices at the company's New York Imp studios. While Mr. Cohn is comparatively a young man, he is one of the oldest in the film game in point of service and experience.

The above is a photograph of Mr. Cohn and his cameraman working in and around the East. Reading from left to right they are: Eugene Cugnet, cameraman; John Cohn, editor; W. R. Goodwyn who has just returned from Mexico after six months service with Carranza; U. K. Whipple, head cameraman; Joseph Rucker, who just returned from Vera Cruz after passage down there on a U. S. battleship and witnessing and securing pictures of the first encounter with the Mexicans; Edmund Starring, for many years connected with European weeklies and now a star Animated cameraman.

By the Goat Man

I WAS in Dayton, Ohio, just one day and that was enough. I saw the exhibits of the space buyers during the day and heard the grievance session of the space-buying representatives at night. I saw the opening session of the M. P. E. L. of A. convention with its president in action. I heard the wail of the exhibitors who were chucked four in a room at the hotels at $18.00 a day. I fell for $6 a day myself—and Al Haase staid right on in the teeth of it. They broke ground for a new million dollar hotel in Dayton, Thursday of convention week, and the exhibitors stood around and cried, fulfilling their part of the ceremonies. I saw everything Dayton has to show anybody and I'm glad I don't have to live there. The handwriting on the wall was so plain all day Tuesday that I slept well on a Panhandle train that night. I knew, even before Neff did his heavy thinking stunt in his rooms Tuesday night, that he was a goner. Neff had a counting of noses that same night while I slept and then he knew where he was at. The speech he made Wednesday was punctuated with applause following those sentences where he said he was through. I dread funerals, hoping to attend only those that can't be escaped. I could escape Neff's funeral and I did. Dayton even as Neff's burial place has no claim upon my memory. It was no place to hold a convention.

And now that it is all over, it is somewhat comforting to know that this tilting beacon called the turn all the way. When New York asked for an essay using for its theme the remedy to amalgamate the two exhibitors' bodies, you may recall the brevity of my contribution, "Eliminate Neff!" That was all there was to offer. Time has proven that Neff out of the way there was only one exhibitor body. Neff simply failed in holding his own exhibitor following. The League and the Association settled their troubles in speedy fashion when they agreed to elect Neff's successor.

T. P. Finnegan of Texas found the Goat's sanctum July 13. He says that the first meeting of the executive committee will be held in November and plans will then be considered for an active campaign of exhibitor recruiting. In the meantime, exhibitors of this country should be deciding for themselves that they join the national exhibitors. The per capita tax is only $2.00 a year and the exhibitor who hasn't that much pride is nursing a low batting average. If you don't know where to send your money, send it to me and I'll see that your name is written on the honor roll.

Big Bill Sweeney showed Finnegan the road to my pasture. It sounds good to find the name of our beloved Big Bill written in the records where it belongs. I have been kind to William of late. I have seen so much of him that I never knew before. At New York his popularity ran away up and at Dayton he was always under the spotlight. The more you travel along with some folks the better they wear. Bill Sweeney is 100% stuff all day and all night. He hasn't missed a meeting of exhibitors for four years and I fancy he has only got a fair start. When I go into the picture game as an exhibitor, I will want to go in with Bill Sweeney. Then I will get something of his fine old spirit of sending flowers to those folks who never expect them.

I'm glad they got through at Dayton when they did for Sam Trigger was badly needed in New York the Monday following, because of the threat of the fire department to close up the "robbers' roost." Fred Beecroft lives up there, too, and I'm sure he's fireproof. It has always been a mystery to me why the "roost" is threatened every time Trigger leaves New York. It must be the fire department's standing joke.

* * *

Trigger, you know, was at Dayton. Some of the boys from the high-grass districts thought Sam wanted something at Dayton, but they got fooled. The only thing Trigger wanted he got and I'm sure it was worth all the time and trouble it cost.

F. O. Nielsen has taken on the services of Frank Cook to help him with "The Spoilers" in the states of Illinois, outside of Cook county, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan and Wisconsin. Among all the men we know, Frank Cook seems especially fitted for the post, because he knows the game coming and going. "The Spoilers" is a film show that has had all the praise we know how to bestow upon it. It will be a film show until the last man has seen it and I know that many men will care to see it more than once. Few film offerings take hold so quickly and never let go.

been a terrible week to find still pictures fit to print. We have dumped all kinds of photographs into the yawning maw of our biggest waste paper basket with the same comment—"impossible." Dopesters please note.

Why should we be asked to make half tone illustrations of veritable daubs? The still picture should always carry the conviction that it is typical of the film itself. When the still is bad, the reader immediately concludes that the film is worse. Producers will please heed this homely appeal. Look to your stills first—the film afterwards!

I wonder why we don't hear more about Mary Pickford? Everybody knows where she is in the flesh, but her activities on the screen are all out of keeping with the temperature. Anybody with a film of Mary's that isn't working?

At the first meeting of the executive committee of the League to be held in November, there will be important matters to consider. Among them, a new name for the national exhibitors, and the next convention place. For the good of the cause I can think of no better name than the Motion Picture Exhibitors of America. This eliminates both the "League" and the "Association." I am also heartily in favor of California for the next annual convention—preferable Los Angeles. Film manufacturers themselves should have a very large say in naming the convention city. Nearly all of them are represented near Los Angeles and I'm sure the live exhibitors of this country will want to take in the exposition at San Francisco before they return. By holding the convention in L. A. they would see both the California cities and the exposition. If the convention is held in San Francisco, many would overlook Los Angeles.

There is a lot of comfort in the thought that there will be but one convention.

Shows Power of Hypnotism

The hypnotic influence of a wicked, family intruder over the wife of his friend causes the unhappiness and tragedy in a three reel drama, released by the Leading Players Film Corporation, entitled, "Forces of Evil, or The Dominant Will." The splendid interpretation of the various roles is greatly increased by the types chosen to characterize them. The beautiful scenes and artistic furnishings, coupled with the acting, make the production a drama of the de luxe class.

Dr. Gregory becomes acquainted with the Livroy family and becomes a frequent visitor. This is mostly because of his attraction for Mr. Livroy's wife, Lucille. He exercises his powers of hypnotism on Lucille and causes her to desert her husband and family, although she is greatly attached to them.

Reading his wife's letter of farewell, Livroy is infuriated and in order to forget her, sells his home and buys a beautiful villa on the cliffs. While walking through the grounds one day he is informed by the children's nurse that his wife and another man are on the premises. He comes upon them and engages in a fight with Gregory. Livroy is left stunned by Gregory. Lucille is prevented from going to her husband's assistance by the doctor. They quarrel and in the struggle fall over the cliff.

Livroy, fully recovered, allows Lucille to see the children but refuses to either forget or forgive. In his dying statement Gregory accuses Livroy of assaulting him. Livroy is arrested and held in jail until a full confession of his wife's desertion and all that followed clears him of any suspicion. Learning at last the real story of his wife's reason for leaving, Livroy forgives her, and the family lives happily in the knowledge that the cause of all their sorrow can trouble them no longer.

Holmes Travelettes Successful

There is every reason to believe that the Burton Holmes Travelettes, which began a season of five weeks at the Studebaker Theater in Chicago, following a long run of "The Spoilers," have come to stay. Owing to exceptionally hot weather they did not open to big business, but before the end of the week, the Studebaker was selling to capacity every afternoon and evening. The Holmes Travelette is a condensed version of the parent Travelogue, which this famous globe trotter and popular lecturer has given in New York, Chicago and a few of the other big cities each season.

Leslie Jefferson, whose enunciation is above criticism and choice of language superb, lectured the first of the travelettes which was entitled "The New Manila."

Officers Visit Studio

A recent visit to the studio of the Excelsior Feature Film Company Inc., at Lake Placid, New York by William H. Wright, the treasurer, and Arthur Rosenbach, the sales manager, was the occasion of much celebration by the players there assembled. The visiting officers were met at the train, several miles from the studio, by a large delegation and escorted to the plant. The business meeting held the following day was resultant in much good. Despite the fact that this is the very worst time of year for trying to sell anything, Arthur Rosenbach, sales manager of the Excelsior Company, reports he is closing several very desirable deals on his picture "The Toll of Mammon" in four parts, featuring Octavia Handworth.

Famous Playwright Visits Studio

Sir Henry Arthur Jones, the celebrated English playwright, who arrived from London a short time ago, presumably for the purpose of making a study of dramatic conditions in America, last week visited the studios of the Famous Players Film Company in New York.

The distinguished dramatist recently singled out the Famous Players from a number of other producing concerns for the privilege of filming his most noted successes and on his trip to their plant took a keen interest in the activities, becoming enthusiastic over a scene in the course of production from "Behind the Scenes," a play of theatrical life by Margaret Mayo, with Mary Pickford in the leading role. Sir Jones was visibly impressed by the degree of realism aimed at in the scene, which represented the interior of a metropolitan theater, with actors constituting the audience watching what purported to be an entire musical comedy company on the stage.

Among his most noted works which will be produced in motion pictures by the Famous Players Film Company are "The Masquerader," "Saints and Sinners," "The Dancing Girl," and the most celebrated of all his works, "The Silver King."

New Thrill Added to Thanhouser Serial

Persons waiting for the Seacliffe ferry at New Rochelle were startled one day last week when an automobile rushed toward the open draw and plunged into Long Island Sound, carrying with it three men passengers. Just as the machine tottered on the edge of the draw another car raced up and out of it stepped a man holding a smoking revolver in his hand and a daintily gowned woman. . . . . .

The onlookers stood horrified until cameras ceased clicking and then realized that a new thrill had been written into "The Million-Dollar Mystery," Thanhouser's new serial. Albert Froom, formerly of the Hippodrome, and two other daredevils were the men who made the mad plunge, James Cruze was the man with the smoking revolver and Florence La Badie was his partner in the second auto.

It took two days to get this scene as the crowd that gathered on the first attempt made it impossible for the players to work.

Fame of Screen Stars Illustrated

Perhaps the grip of motion pictures upon the public has never been more clearly illustrated than recently when Brock and Company, a Los Angeles jeweler firm, displayed over 800 photographs of the stars of the screen in their windows. For three weeks the pictures, several of which were life size, remained on display and during this time the sidewalk in front of their store was crowded continually and on several occasions it became necessary to call upon the police to quiet those who could not get close enough to see. It is estimated that fully 100,000 people viewed the display, which was a striking contrast to the practically deserted lobby of a nearby theater where fully as many pictures of the world famous stars of the stage hung.

A. Danson Michell, who has been connected in an editorial capacity with the Motion Picture News for the past ten month, and previous to that with the Dramatic Mirror, has taken charge of the advertising and publicity department of the Excelsior Feature Film Company, Inc.

Terwilliger Exceedingly Busy

George Terwilliger, who just returned from St. Augustine, Florida, with a troupe of Lubin players, is producing an unusual photoplay which is original in every respect—plot—characters—scenes and conception. It was written for him by Lawrence McCloskey. Raymond Hitchcock, Flora Zabelle and a selected Lubin cast are appearing in this "photophantasy" which Terwilliger is filming in five parts.

Mr. Hitchcock and Miss Zabelle are late recruits from the musical comedy stage and are very much enthused with their new work. They have both expressed their willingness to be directed by a motion picture director and have pledged themselves to work very hard. The interiors required weeks of preparation, and the exteriors will be photographed on Mr. Hitchcock's estate at Long Island.

This is the third big undertaking for the young Lubin director, the first two being the filming of Charles Klein's "The Daughters of Men" and "The Gamblers."

Completes Religious Subject

News comes from Rome that the big party of Cines players who went to the Holy Land last October have returned, after nine months' work in completing an elaborate study of Christ's life in Palestine. Advance reports indicate that the time and money invested in this big picture should make it a triumph of its kind, as practically all of the famous Cines players under Director Guazzoni who made "Quo Vadis" and "Antony and Cleopatra" engaged in the manufacture of the big subject.

Big Advertising Picture

The Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago has taken about 2,000 feet of motion pictures of strawberry picking and canning and tomato culture as handled by the H. J. Heinz Company of Pittsburg, Pa. These two reels are part of one of the largest contracts for motion picture advertising ever undertaken by a film company. All phases of the work done by the Heinz company will be illustrated before the series is completed, the pictures to be used in connection with advertising lectures.

Another Re-Issue of Pickford Films

The Biograph Company has announced that it will re-issue all of the pictures in which Mary Pickford played while under its banner. These will include many of her early successes, and will be booked through the General Film Company. A short time ago the Universal Company also announced its intention of placing some pictures on the market in which the little star appeared while with it.

Goes to Her Final Home

Margarita Fischer has an unusual role in "The Other Train," a Beauty film. She is shown in a railway station awaiting the train that is to bear her to the poorhouse. Then in a vision the experiences of her life pass before her. She is seen as a successful vaudeville actress, and her decline in public favor is shown until she reaches a point where only the almshouse awaits her. But she does not go there, for death comes to her as she dreams.

THE AMALGAMATION PROCESS.

IT has been proposed, or perhaps we should say suggested, that a very simple change would make the name of the present Exhibitors' League acceptable even to those who have become so attached to the newer Association that a return to the older body has no charms for them. The suggestion is to eliminate the word "league" or "association" altogether, making the title "Motion Picture Exhibitors of America."

The work of amalgamation is progressing very nicely, and it may be possible to consummate it without any change whatever. Those who bolted and formed the Association a year ago found their spur to action in the League's administration, not in the League itself or its name. To return to the League now that the administration has changed, and especially since the Association has four members on the League executive board, would be wholly reasonable and honorable. Still, there may exist some human feeling that returning to the fold is a backward step, as confession of weakness; or even that is too pointed a reflection upon the old League administration.

Any of these reasons, while of no material consequence, might possibly stay the progress of amalgamation proceedings. So the proposal to start over again with a brand new name has some weight, especially as the Association is, for all practical purposes, already as powerful and solid as the League.

It is evident that the elimination of the word "league" from the title of that organization is the simplest possible change, and one that would give the least offense to anybody. So it may be well to hold the suggestion in readiness in case any disagreement on the point should arise.

The new executive board of the League has nine members—five League and four Association. Two of the five League members are said to be entirely in sympathy with the four Association members, giving the latter a clear majority of the board. And as the whole effort of the Association has been to bring about a reconciliation, we are positively assured now that a single organization will come out of the melting pot—a condition for which we have been pleading for the last twelve months.

Now the sky of organization seems all serene. With but a little more interest on the part of exhibitors, a little more willingness to accept the responsibilities as well as the benefits of membership, and we will have a trade association second to none in any industry.

THE BERLIN FILM STRIKE.

IN Berlin, Germany, they have censorship, too. And the film companies pay for the privilege at the rate of twenty-five cents per subject, which money goes to the police. Now twenty-five cents is not a large amount per release; but the Berliners, emboldened by the success of the original system, are now endeavoring to make it twenty-five cents per print or copy. That puts a tax on the film business in Berlin of some hundreds of thousands of dollars a year.

So the film companies have called a strike.

Ordinarily we do not heartily approve of strikes. The very word seems to conjure up pictures of hungry children and violent men. Besides, there is no editors' union, anyway. But when one does not like his position, the obvious thing to do is to quit. The film men of Berlin did not like theirs.

A strike is always expensive all around. In this case it will be expensive to the striking manufacturers because their undisposed-of films will pile up and bring no revenue. It will be more expensive to the exhibitors because they cannot get the public's pfennigs and marks, having no pictures to make a program that the people will pay to see.

The purpose of the strike, of course, is two-fold, as usual: To bring the authorities to their senses by depriving them of the censorship fees, and to call public attention to the injustice of the condition. But if, as has been sometimes reported, German authorities are both difficult of persuasion and indifferent to public opinion, then the film strike is likely to terminate unsatisfactorily to the film interests.

At any rate, it is a novelty in entertainment circles, and apparently the only method possible under the circumstances. So hard as it is on the exhibitors, we hope they will join cheerfully with the manufacturers in making public the absurdity of taxing each facsimile copy of an original already inspected and taxed.

Bad as the censorship situation is in some parts of this country, it has not yet imposed a fee for every time an inspector looks at a film. If it ever reaches that stage our own manufacturers would doubtless be tempted to blow a whistle and call out all the films.

VULGARITY IN COMEDIES.

SOME people may suppose, without thinking much about it, that a certain amount of vulgarity is necessary to make a successful comedy. At least some film producers give evidence of entertaining that idea, for it is hard to believe that they use the subjects they do because of a personal admiration for them. The most charitable view is that they are poor judges of human nature and public taste.

A letter lies on our desk bearing the signature, "Overworked Movie Fan." Were it not for that signature, and the absence of any other, we would print the letter. It mentions by title and maker as nice a collection of vulgarity as has appeared on the screen since the good, rotten old days when everything went. And we must, perforce and against our will, agree with the letter writer, whoever he or she may be.

We are not accusing anybody or any film of immorality or suggestiveness or criminal appeal, but of plain, dirty vulgarity; the sort of stuff that the police cannot interfere with, yet which certainly displeases and disgusts all persons of decent training and civilized instinct. Even suggestiveness and criminal appeal may be artistically done—therein lies their danger; but vulgarity is merely revolting, and is dangerous only to the film business itself.

When it seemed necessary, we vigorously decried the use of cheap vaudeville in picture shows—not because we wanted to shut the vaudevillians out of any money, but because their stuff was not up to motion picture standard. It is hard to think now that some of the picture comedies are worse than a twenty-dollar vaudeville turn ever hoped to be.

It is very easy to point a camera lens and crank out five hundred feet of film at the standard price per foot, for which an office-boy of ordinary ingenuity can stage a flea-scratching contest, a lost-trousers adventure, or a mud melee. But to ask exhibitors to entertain their carefully built up patronage with the results is too much.

We are confronted on one hand with masterpieces of film fiction such as we scarcely dared hope to attain to a few years ago—magnificent works of living art that delight the soul of the most cultured and inspire even the illiterate. On the other hand we view gutter comedies of a sort to cause a recent meal to rest uneasily. Can we expect people of any class to turn lightly from the one to the other and enjoy both?

We do not mention these vulgarity specialties because they are in any way common, but because their isolated examples stand out like a sore thumb. But this splendid body industrial cannot afford to smile when one sore appears, and wait for more before applying a cure. The motion picture is watched with exceeding closeness, by enemies as well as friends. The least suspicion of a canker should be cut out immediately, or never allowed to form. We have proved to what heights we can soar; let us have no suggestion of depths to which it might be possible to descend.

BOOK ON MOTION PICTURE OPERATION.

There has just been published a new book, "Motion Picture Operation, Stage Electrics and Illusions," which should be of interest to picture theater managers and assistants. This book is written by Messrs. Horstmann and Tousley, who are directly connected with the inspection of motion picture theaters in Chicago, and their wide knowledge of electricity and their experience with motion picture theaters equip them perfectly to write on the subject.

The book takes up in detail every conceivable feature of motion picture operation. It is a practical instruction book, written in language that any man can understand, and yet all of the principles are fully explained. The chapter on the handling of films and fire protection alone is worth several times the cost of this book.

The volume constitutes a simple and practical handbook. A working knowledge of electricity on the part of the readers has been assumed by the authors, and elementary ideas are therefore treated sparingly. A specialty has been made, however, of all matters peculiar to theaters.

The book has over 200 pages, with 215 illustrations and diagrams. It is bound in limp leather stamped in gold, with red edges; pocket size. It sells at $2.00.

THIS CAMERAMAN LUCKY.

It is not often that a cinematographer is lucky enough to be on the spot at the moment an unscheduled and serious accident occurs. Such luck is the desideratum of all photographers, and it is conceded happens only once in a long life-time. But, this "once-in-a-life-time" event was given recently to a French representative camera man of the Mutual Weekly, when he secured pictures of the big aeroplane accident which caused the death of two daring birdmen, Messieurs Bourhis and Pelletier, at the aerodrome of Buc near Versailles, France, and which is shown on Mutual Weekly No. 81. The release date for this weekly is July 15.

Europe's Foremost Star Now in Films

Wonderful Lyda Borelli

Greeting an old friend, after her marriage.

Insanely jealous over her husband's conduct.

LYDA BORELLI, the celebrated stage celebrity, whose name and fame are known to every European capital, is now a picture star. She has entered into a contract with the Cines Company of Rome to appear in a number of multitple reel subjects, among which are included adaptations of several of the most famous novels of modern times.

To George Kliene of Chicago is said to belong the honor of inducing Miss Borelli to forsake the stage for pictures, and anyone who has witnessed her wonderful performance in "The Naked Truth," the only film yet released by Mr. Kliene in America in which this woman of a thousand moods appears, will instantly congratulate the American genius who is responsible for her appearance in the picture. No more interesting performance has probably ever taken place before a motion picture camera, and the other films which are still to come are said to show her in still more startling productions.

Lyda Borelli.
Another stage celebrity now a picture star.

At one moment she is gay and vivacious, bright and happy and carefree; a second later we behold her roused to intense jealousy, her eyes alight with passion and her whole body fairly radiating vengeance and hatred; another change of scene shows her melancholy, hopeless and dejected, and still another depicts her in an entirely different mood. But whatever the emotion she is interpreting, whether she is happy or sad, carefree or melancholy, jealous or vivacious, she is always the artiste. Her magnetism is so great that she grasps and holds your attention even though she is far in the background of a crowded stage, and a score or more of other talented players are enacting a scene of importance close up to the camera.

Her gowns alone are a revelation. The greatest designers of Europe have been called upon to supply her wardrobe, which appears unlimited in size and style, and some of the creations she wears in "The Naked Truth" made even blasé New Yorkers open their eyes when the picture was running at the Candler theater in that city. All of them are daring, all of them are unique, and one or two of them are so startling as to suggest the much-talked-of wardrobe of Gaby Deslys, who was a recent visitor to America.

From the above it must not be supposed that Miss Borelli has to rely upon an unusual or unique wardrobe to make herself renowned, for such is far from being the case. It is her wonderfully expressive face, capable of portraying any emotion, that enables her to draw a salary such as probably no American player ever dreamed of. It is her ability to throw herself body and soul into the role she is playing at the moment that makes her supreme, and one would probably search the world over to find another like her.

To give a more adequate idea of her versatility one has only to briefly mention the changes she accomplishes in "The Naked Truth." The picture begins with her an humble artist's model. She is winsome and happy and gay. She meets and poses for Pierre, a poor and almost unknown painter. Love dawns for these two and Miss Borelli is incomparable in the love scenes. Poverty overtakes Pierre and his wife shortly after their marriage, and we see the star kind, gentle and sympathetic. To earn a bare living for herself and Pierre she poses for a princess and her features in this scene display all the hunger, weariness and suffering in the world, while through it all runs her desire to be brave and courageous enough to continue her pose.

Finally Pierre wins fame and fortune and the wife becomes a gay butterfly, though her love for her celebrated husband overcomes all other emotions. Pierre then meets and is fascinated by the princess and jealousy creeps into Borelli's face. Jealousy turns to hate and, finally, she wreaks her vengeance in a bitter scene with the woman who has stolen her husband's love. An attempt at suicide follows and then a long period of suffering in a hospital. We see her learn that her husband's love is gone forever and then behold her meeting with a friend of the long ago, who loves her deeply and sincerely, and, finally, behold her happy once again, as the wife of the man who found her alone and heartbroken, in the hospital.

Spend Small Fortune to Secure Thrills

In striving for realism in its picturized stories the Vitagraph Company has already spent thousands of dollars to meet the demands of moving picture fans for thrills. Not long since, the company purchased and destroyed a 90-horsepower, seven-passenger touring car, which cost it several thousand dollars; and a week or so ago it spent $15,000 in a train wreck. Now, as the big feature in a coming Broadway Star Feature release, it has purchased a private sea-going yacht which will be blown to atoms by a giant torpedo fired from a torpedo boat. It is said the craft cost the company in the neighborhood of $25,000.

Girl's Happiness Ruined by Mother

Love Finally Triumphs

IN "The Broken Barrier", the American release of Monday, July 27, the "Flying A" players have put over a real human interest story, one that grips your interest and holds it to the end. The plot is not artificial but develops naturally, and is worked up to the climax so carefully that one is held spellbound until the heroine finally achieves the happiness she has struggled so hard to win.

Scenic backgrounds of wondrous beauty frequently occur as settings for the action of the story, and the oft-mentioned American photography brings out every shadow, every leaf of the foliage and every odd formation of rock in the scene outspread before our eyes.

Edward Coxen, as Jack Hillery, makes the hero a most likable sort of chap, while Winnifred Greenwood, as Eunice Cosgrove, the heroine of the tale and later the wife of Hillery, is seen to splendid advantage. George Field, as usual, handles the heavy role in his masterly way and Ida Lewis, who is rapidly coming to the front as a character woman of note, gets everything possible out of her part.

As the story begins we see Mrs. Cosgrove and her daughter, Eunice, a debutante of the season, reading in the morning paper that Jack Hillery, a young man of wealth, is the last available catch of the season. Mrs. Cosgrove, who knows that her personal fortune is badly depleted, conceives a plan of arranging a marriage for her daughter with Hillery, and thus restoring her shrunken fortune, but is crafty enough to conceal her plot from the girl.

The following day Eunice goes for a canter along the boulevards and her horse, becoming unmanageable, runs away. Hillery happens to be out for a morning ride and sees the runaway. Eager to aid beauty in distress, the young clubman promptly starts in pursuit and after a long chase along beautiful tree-lined streets manages to overtake Eunice and to halt the progress of the frightened horse.

The danger once over, the girl's nerve fails her and she faints in Hillery's arms. The young man eventually revives her and escorts her home, where he meets Mrs. Cosgrove.

Mrs. Cosgrove's whole demeanor changed when she learned the young man's name.

Mrs. Cosgrove is at first inclined to look with disfavor upon the young hero whom Eunice has brought home with her, but when he presents his card and the designing mother learns that he is the popular young clubman whom she has set out to win for her daughter she becomes most cordial, and invites him to call frequently upon Eunice.

Jack is much infatuated with the girl he has met so romantically but a day or two later, when he receives a letter from Mrs. Cosgrove suggesting that a marriage with Eunice would be an ideal match, since the girl is wealthy in her own name and could bring him a dowry of no small amount in return for the high social position he can bestow upon her, Jack's affections undergo a decided change.

Accordingly his calls upon Eunice cease altogether and the affair seems to have ended, especially as Jack has returned Mrs. Cosgrove her letter accompanied by a note to the effect that he is not in the market for a society bud and that the mother has wholly misjudged him if she thinks he can be subsidized to marry her daughter. Mrs. Cosgrove is naturally furious when she reads Hillery's note and understands that she has blundered badly. Surprised by her daughter in reading the note from Jack, Mrs. Cosgrove hastily slips the note into a drawer of Eunice's dressing table and conceals from the girl the attempt she has made to win Hillery for her husband.

Some time later Eunice encounters Jack at a country club and the young man, believing that the girl herself must be ignorant of the mother's plan to bribe him, renews his attentions. Soon the affair has reached the engagement point and a date is set for the wedding.

Time flies quickly past and the wedding day itself finally arrives. An hour or two following the marriage ceremony and while Eunice is packing some things to take with her on her wedding trip, she comes upon the letter which months before her mother had concealed in the dressing table drawer. The knowledge that her mother had so brazenly tried to buy Hillery's love for her completely upsets Eunice and it is with a heavy heart in her bosom, rather than as a joyful and light hearted bride that she sets out upon her honeymoon.

Believing that Jack has married her for her money alone, Eunice at once gives her husband to understand that their marriage shall be one of form only and that she will be his wife merely in name. Greatly surprised, Jack hears this declaration from his wife, but cannot understand the cause for such an attitude on the part of Eunice.

When the young couple return from their honeymoon and go to housekeeping in the mansion which Jack has prepared the two settle down to a life of formality, though keeping appearance of perfect happiness when attending social affairs. Jack tries again and again to win the perfect trust of his wife, but without avail. Eunice still believes herself a mere chattel which Jack has purchased and grows farther and farther away from her husband as the days pass.

One night Jack discovers that his wife is the guest of a certain clubman of bad reputation and going to the cafe where she is dining with this other man, he finds that he has arrived just in time to prevent his wife being insulted. He proceeds to vent his vengeance upon the man who has dared to offend his wife, and then takes Eunice home. The girl is on the point of at last giving her husband her full love, but when he answers her query of "Why did you save me Jack?" with the stern sentence "To protect my honor," she resumes her old attitude.

The young husband finds his business on the verge of ruin and in an attempt to recoup his losses plunges on Consolidated Traction at the stock exchange, at the same time that Eunice begins some wild speculations of her own. Through some irony of fate Jack has taken the opposite side of the market from his wife, and as the ticker unreels its story of the day's transactions Jack finds that he has won a fortune, while poor Eunice is told by her broker that her entire holdings have been wiped out.

When Jack returns home to find his wife in tears over her losses, an explanation ensues which not only clears up everything for Eunice and convinces her that Jack has married her for love and love alone, but also results in both the young people deciding that the fortune which Jack has won on the stock exchange shall be not his, or not hers, but theirs. With this understanding and everything pointing toward future happiness for the Hillerys the story ends.

The complete cast is as follows:

Jack Hillery, clubman.....Ed Coxen
Eunice Cosgrove, a society girl.....Winnifred Greenwood
Mrs. Cosgrove, her mother.....Ida Lewis
Harry Mortimer, clubman.....George Field
Black, a stock broker.....John Steppling
Marsh, a stock broker.....William Bertram

Roskam Back from Europe

Edward M. Roskam, president of the Life Photo Film Corporation, returned last Wednesday from a tour of England and the continent. After a very successful stay in London he has succeeded in closing agencies for all productions of the Life Photo Film Corporation throughout the entire world. The American Continental Film Company of No. 7 Rupert Court, London, has been granted the exclusive selling rights of all the Life Photo productions. Mr. Bowden, manager of the American & Continental Film Company, is one of the best known film men in England, and is absolutely posted as to the market conditions and what the foreign exhibitors desire.

Mr. Roskam states that the motion picture industry in England at the present time is practically nil. The feature buyers are holding off until the cold weather sets in, and the exhibitors, to a man, are using repeat programs. After studying the marget conditions, Mr. Roskam tells us that he bowed to the English demand and cut down "The Banker's Daughter" and "The Greyhound" to 3,500 feet.

Mr. Roskam, on behalf of the Life Photo Film Corporation, closed a contract with the American & Continental Film Company, whereby the Life Photo Film Corporation will act as American agent for the American & Continental Film Company, which has offices in every principal city, town and province in England and the continent, and controls, as booking agent, the largest chain of theaters in Europe.

Miss Marguerite Snow, accompanied by James Cruze and Lloyd Lonergran, visited Washington, D. C., last week where several scenes for Thanhouser's big serial, "The Million Dollar Mystery," were filmed. While at the capital, Miss Snow had the honor of being accorded a place in the receiving line at a reception given at the home of Speaker Champ Clark. The party also attended many other social functions.

Amalgamation Movement in Progress

Important Steps Taken

PERMANENT amalgamation of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and the International Motion Picture Association will be effected. With four members of the Association on the League's new executive board, and enough of the League's officers with them to make a majority, the progressive program of consolidation is well under way. The executive board now consists of President Marion A. Pearce; First Vice President T. P. Finnegan; Second Vice President Mark E. Cory; Secretary W. R. Wilson; Treasurer Peter J. Jeup; William J. Sweeney, Illinois; C. H. Phillips, Wisconsin; A. P. Tugwell, California, and Fulton Brylawski, Washington, D. C. The latter four are Association representatives.

The peace plan for reconciliation of the two organizations of the motion picture men, as outlined at the executive meeting Wednesday night, July 8, provided for representation upon the national executive committee of both contending factions.

The newly-elected officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and the delegation of mediators from the International Motion Picture Association comprised the committee, which met in executive session at the Memorial Hall.

It was asserted by the seven members of the International Association committee on unity, that if the agreement were ratified Wisconsin Association with 210 members; New York with 600 members; California with 132; Indiana with 320; Minnesota with 128; Pennsylvania with 120; Massachusetts with 150; New Jersey with 64; Cleveland local with 79, now an independent body, and other purely local associations unattached, would rejoin the League.

The meeting at Memorial Hall was attended by the executive committee and others appointed, representing the League, and seven members of the International. The League representatives were: M. A. Neff, M. A. Pearce, G. H. Wiley, T. P. Finnegan, M. E. Cory, Peter J. Jeup, L. W. Brophy and J. J. Reider. Committeemen representing the International were: William J. Sweeney, Chicago; Samuel H. Trigger, New York; Charles S. Phillips, Milwaukee; Judge A. P. Tugwell, California; Samuel Bullock, Cleveland; F. J. Herrington, Pennsylvania; F. J. Rembush, Shelbyville, Ind., and Tom Furniss, Duluth, Minn.

After the conference it was announced that the M. P. E. L. of A. had agreed to admit the Association members to membership and had also consented to give the Association a representation of four members on the national executive board.

Samuel Trigger, leader of the international delegation, said Thursday morning that in the event this program was carried out, all differences would be adjusted and the merging of the two organizations into one would ensue.

The report of the retiring president, M. A. Neff, did not touch upon the subject of amalgamation. It did, however, contain the following recommendations:

That each of the state national committeemen be appointed a member of a committee to plan finances for the coming year.

That theater owners get first consideration on the part of film manufacturers and exchanges.

That there be greater co-operation with the exchanges and film makers and among the exhibitors.

That exhibitors retain papers and receipts for the $2 a week paid the Motion Picture Patents Company, suit to dissolve which as a trust has been filed by the federal government.

Shorter programs for film theaters.

Dispense with posters when possible.

Advance admission to 10 cents wherever possible.

That more one and two reel films be made.

Request manufacturers to so reduce scenaries as to permit one reel films wherever possible instead of two, three and four.

Consider carefully censorship.

Protect exhibitor so that after a film has once been passed it may be run continually thereafter without interference.

That only exhibitors be privileged to be members of the League.

Oppose manufacturers and exchanges engaging in exhibition work.

William J. Sweeney.

Judge A. P. Tugwell.

Fulton Brylawski.

C. H. Phillips.

Association Representatives on the League Executive Board.

Co-operate in League matters and oppose interference of non-members.

Admit press to all sessions.

That the League enter into an alliance with persons or organizations and maintain a "middle of the road" policy for the benefit of the exhibitors only.

Mr. Neff reported that he had advanced to the treasurer during the year $3,425 on money transmitted him and that he had also forwarded $2,682.06. The sum of $2,990.52 was consumed in the maintenance of office and $409 was contributed for his services. The League owed him on salary, $1,620.87.

Secretary Wiley's report, summarized, showed that 890 members withdrew last year, in New York, Minnesota, Illinois and Indiana. Ohio membership is 420. Total national membership July 1, 1914, providing all had paid arrearages, was 1,319, but only 1,082 are in full standing, about 600 less than last year. During the year state charters were issued Oregon, North Carolina, South Carolina. Maine withdrew.

Expenses of President Neff were $4,310.58 complete; Secretary Wiley, $1,589.83, and of Treasurer Parker, $108.15. During the year only $4,684.40 was collected from all sources, of which $2,025 was in per capita tax. Total expenses, including bills due, were 7,112.80, leaving a deficit of $3,000.

Total expenses of the convention and exposition were about $5,400, including labor, police, prizes, entertainments, etc. Sale of space in the exposition yielded $6,200, the program $925 and the National Cash Register Company contributed $1,500, so the deficit was covered. Treasurer Parker reported total balance on hand of $1,197.76. Mr. Neff was handed a draft for his back salary.

The executive committee of the League will meet next November, the place and exact date to be announced later.

The Man With the Scissors

By S. M. Spedon.

Sam Spedon.

When we see the finished article of any kind, we never think of the different hands through which it has passed to accomplish its completion. We venture to say no one outside the studios has ever heard of the expert trimmer. It is high time to bring his light from under the bushel, to shed its rays on the book of knowledge. There is a great difference between a trimmer and an "expert trimmer." The former cuts with his hands, mechanically, and the latter with his hands and his brain, intelligently.

The expert trimmer is the regular "cut-up" of the film business, the man that trims the films. He has been facetiously, but truthfully called the surgeon of motion pictures. By amputations, judicious splints, incisions and careful grafting, he makes crippled pictures whole and saves others from the "morgue." The directors occasionally produce neither wisely nor well, and it is up to the expert trimmer of the producing company to put them in shape with his scissors and cement. The negative is delivered into his hands and he gives it not only the "once over," but a very careful examination as to its continuity and fitness, as a whole, the relation of one scene to another and the consecutive order in which the different scenes are placed. In short, he has got to see that the picturization of the story has made it intelligible to others. If he finds the one thousand or more feet of film interpret the story rightly, then he has little or nothing to do.

In numerous cases, however, he finds the director has taken a whole lot of useless scenes and others that are so poorly enacted that they are worse than useless. In such cases he is obliged to trim and adjust the different scenes, placing them in order, suggesting perhaps a new scene, or "cut-in," to properly connect one scene with another. Again, he may find it necessary to suggest a fitting title to make clear what the director has failed to produce. Where a director has taken scenes which he considers useless, the trimmer will find these discards very serviceable in his grafting operations, making good what was considered waste pieces. After he has performed these operations, the negative is then printed in the positive. The first print is run and he gives it a careful inspection, and if found necessary, he gives it another treatment and makes it a presentable subject. The expert trimmer is one of the powers behind the throne. He is never seen, probably never known. Authors, editors, directors and players receive the credit of it all, but he is very rarely, if ever, mentioned.

We believe he should come into his own and get his just deserts. He has seldom been recognized outside of the negative department. He is now acknowledged as a positive power, a person of keen judgment, artistic appreciation, and a thorough knowledge of his art and those who participate in it. He should be honored with the degree of M. D., "Doctor of Movies," and we feel that he has earned it and the title of "Doctor." Two of the most expert of the profession are "Dr." Elmer MacIntosh and "Dr." Frank Lawrence of the Vitagraph Company, whose pictures are shown on this page.

Realistic acting in the first feature being put on by the United Keanograph Company of Fairfax, Cal., almost cost E. Alyn Warren, the leading man, his life. James Keane, the director, had a friend who was cashier of a bank, had Warren go to the bank as a crook," intending to take a scene without telling his friend. Said friend, however, took the fake robbery very seriously and was about to turn loose a parade of lead when Mr. Keane convinced him Warren was only "playing."

KATHERINE LA SALLE is one of the late recruits from the legitimate stage, her last performance there having been as the lead in "The Yellow Ticket" playing opposite John Mason. During her picture career Miss La Salle has played in "Checkers," opposite Thomas Ross and carried the lead in "The Banker's Daughter," produced by the Life Photo Film Corporation. She has also played in "Northern Lights," the last feature release of the same company. For artistic temperament and consummate acting, Miss La Salle's equal is hard to duplicate. Her facial expression is wonderful and her high moments of dramatic action have often called forth loud applause. Miss La Salle has just left for Europe in order to become acquainted with foreign customs so that she might all the more thoroughly act her part in the production of "Dorothy Vernon of Hadden Hall" to be made by the Life Photo Film Corporation in September.

Katherine La Salle.

William H. Tooker.

HARRY SPRINGER was born in Buffalo, N. Y., and spent his boyhood days in that city. His genial manner has won him a host of friends both among the followers of the screen and the players with whom he works. He is at present playing juvenile leads with the Life Photo Film Corporation and is another striking example of a stage favorite who has created a reputation for himself as a portrayer of the silent types. Mr. Springer has been performing in theatricals ever since he was nine years of age. His work as "Count de Carojac" in "The Banker's Daughter" and as "Whispering Alex" in "The Greyhound," two feature releases of the Life Photo Film Corporation, has added to the laurels already earned by him in the motion picture industry. Before joining the forces of the Life Photo Film Corporation, he played juvenile leads with the Reliance Company.

Harry Springer.

IVA SHEPARD, who plays the lead in "Northern Lights," the recent five part feature release of the Life Photo Film Corporation, received her early experience in theatricals as a member of a San Francisco stock company, and from there worked her way up until she played opposite Richard Mansfield during the last two years of his life. While on the legitimate stage she gained invaluable experience while appearing with the late Sir Henry Irving. Her role in "Northern Lights" calls for strong dramatic interpretation and has been characterized so successfully by Miss Shepard that she has been cast in the leading role in the Life Photo Company's next big feature, which is a five part release entitled "Captain Swift," written by C. Hadden Chambers. Her natural talent supported by years of legitimate stage experience has made Miss Shepard known as an actress who can be depended upon to do "big" things.

Iva Shepard.

Horsley to Produce Comedies

Operations Begin Soon

DAVID HORSLEY'S announcement that he will produce one-reel comedies each week and distribute them through twenty-nine especially organized offices covering the United States, Canada, Europe and South America, marks one of the most seriously important developments in the world of motion pictures during the current year.

Mr. Horsley has long been noted for the seemingly unerring skill with which he foresees the future turn of conditions in the film industry. His actions are therefore closely watched by many whose interests are tied up in motion pictures, much as the barometer is studied by men who follow the sea for a living.

"I have been working on this plan for the last six months," said Mr. Horsley when interviewed at his big glass and concrete palace in Bayonne, N. J., the early part of the week.

"The big feature, as a steady diet, was bound to go. Even if the grand army of 'regular' 5 and 10-cent exhibitors had been able to stand the expense, the falling off of public patronage would in time force the long film out.

"The fundamental reason for the sweeping success of the motion picture show was the cheapness of admission and the variety and constant change of program, which appeal to the people who 'just drop in' now and then, and above all, to the children. Childhood must be served. The little ones, in nine cases out of ten, bring the big ones, who finally become 'fans.' The showman who fails to reckon with the kiddies is overlooking his one best bet.

"Of course there will always be a demand for a limited number of good features by the larger houses and their own particular class of patrons of such high standard that high quality of product is absolutely necessary to hold their interest, but these houses are few compared with the thousands of smaller houses which are and ever have been the backbone of the industry. The very good or the unusual feature will always find a profitable market with the first class, and with this in mind I shall release from time to time a multiple which I hope will live up to that much hackneyed and high-sounding phrase, 'a film masterpiece.'

"With the one-reel comedy plan, I am building for the future as well as the present. Comedies have always been in great demand, but the supply has never been adequate because so few of the manufacturers have solved the problem of production. One of the largest manufacturers in the licensed fold recently declared to me that he had always been afraid of comedies. 'I would rather spend $25,000 on a big feature than $2,500 on a little comedy—the risk with me is not so great,' he said.

"There are several reasons for this condition. In the first place, manufacturers do not study their source of supply. Few writers, however excellent they may be in other lines of authorship, are able to write comedies. Those who are, have, as a rule, amply demonstrated their ability through the medium of the stage or the press. Such authors cannot be tempted into the scenaric field with the paltry sum that is usually considered sufficient to pay for a 'single.' And when the producer does get a likely comedy script, he turns it over to one of his versatile directors who is supposed to be 'good on comedies, too,' and to actors who have had no particular training for this seemingly easy, but actually most difficult, line of acting. The result is a dull, often amateurish picture, and not infrequently the author is blamed for the failure.

"My new plans are already completed and the work of production and office organization is well under way, and the first releases will be made in the early fall.

"I have many original comedies, secured from especially engaged writers, but the basis of my plan is the famous comic series which have been running in the great daily newspapers. These comics, such as 'Babbling Bess,' are in high popular favor in every nook and corner of the land. The demand is already established. I have placed under contract the pick of the celebrated newspaper humorists and comic artists—as many as I can possibly use for the seven comedies a week. The head of my scenario department will be one of the ablest and best known humorists and scenaric writers in America, whose name, when it is finally made public, will cause considerable comment and astonishment. I have also under contract several directors who are 'specialists' and whose names and demonstrated ability will insure the successful working out of the plays. The actors are being picked from the ranks of the trained 'screen' comedians, and from a certain class of theatrical entertainers whose line of work fits them peculiarly for broad, yet artistic motion picture comedies.

"The distribution of those comedies will be made through twenty-six especially equipped offices in the principal cities of the United States and Canada and three in Europe. I am also going after the South American trade in a serious manner and on a scale of magnitude which has never before been attempted.

"I am after the best of the big exchange managers and have a scheme of operation which will make their work more than usually profitable. All productions will be made in the Centaur Film Company's studio in Bayonne, which, I believe, is destined to become the most important plant in America."

The above statement is fraught with interest. There are few men in the film industry who have such equipment and experience, backed up by a record of sound success, as David Rorsley. He has persistently "called the turn" in motion picture development far in advance of its actual happening, and has usually been "there" at the turning point ready to meet whatever may arise. He was the founder of the Centaur Film Company, the oldest in the independent ranks, and has invented many appurtenances and devices which are now essential to the mechanical side of motion picture production.

Jack Richardson of the "Flying A" made such a realistic one armed tramp in "Their Worldly Goods" that a Santa Barbara policeman wanted to arrest him when he became separated from the rest of the troupe.

Variety of Offerings From Edison

Comic-Dramatic-Serial

"THE Living Dead," the next episode of "The Man Who Disappeared," series, takes Marc MacDermott on a steamboat ride down the Hudson River and ends by revealing him to Nelson Wales and the detective, who are riding on the same boat, forcing MacDermott, as John Perriton, to jump from the third deck into the river and swim ashore in order to escape arrest.

In some of the scenes the photography is a trifle dim, but this is because they were taken on board the "Adirondack." The reality of the ship scenes, however, easily makes up for the photographic disadvantages, the dining room and deck scenes on board the boat being especially good.

John Perriton and his companion, Mary Wales, decide that the safest and best way to elude their pursuers is to go back to New York instead of continuing on to Canada as they had previously intended. They arrange for passage on a New York boat, and, to escape suspicion in case the local authorities have been notified, Mary wears a heavy veil, and Perriton a pair of goggles, a cape, and a slouch hat which conceals the upper part of his face.

Meanwhile, Nelson Wales, the real slayer of the man whose murder has driven Perriton from society and made him a fugitive of the law, and the detective who accompanied him in his search for Perriton have given up hope of tracing their man and book passage on the same boat that carries the supposed criminal.

At dinner Nelson Wales discovers that the lady at the next table who has just raised her veil is his sister, and is certain that the man with her, whose back is towards them, must be Perriton. After dinner the detective approaches the couple on deck and arrests the alleged slayer. He is locked in his stateroom and a guard is placed outside the door.

Mary enters her room, which is next to Perriton's, and, in examining the walls finds that they are made up of panels held in place by strips. She manages to loosen the strips holding one of the panels, and after Perriton crawls through, they plan a way to bring about his escape.

The plan works admirably; Mary falls in a faint and Nelson and the detective rush to her assistance. While their backs are turned Perriton hurries out of the stateroom and towards the forward end of the boat, but his captors see him and rush in pursuit.

Perriton's escape from the ship.

With no other way of leaving the boat, Perriton jumps overboard and starts on the long swim to shore.

He appears to weaken when a short distance away and, losing sight of him, the watchers suppose him drowned. Perriton finally reaches shore and, obtaining a change of clothing, hurries to the meeting place agreed upon by him and Mary if anything should happen to separate them. He finds her weeping. At first she will not believe that it is not an apparition, but, on touching him and hearing him talk, she is convinced that it is he, alive and well, and—there the reel ends, but not before we have seen them embrace as two happy lovers should.

AN Edison one-reel Western picture entitled "A Tale of Old Tucson," which will be released on August 11, clearly illustrates the fact that the reason the Edison people have steered clear of western subjects so much in the season past is not because they cannot make them.

It is something new to see Mabel Trunnelle, Herbert Prior, Bigelow Cooper, Yale Boss, and other Edison favorites in western costume after the long siege of society and rural pictures in which they have appeared.

Good effects have been secured in the exteriors, which were taken on Long Island. One silhouette scene is exceptionally fine. It shows Herbert Prior, Yale Boss, and their picketed horse standing on the top of a knoll at dusk.

The story is a simple one, but attractive in its presentation. Sanchez has become indebted to Mexico Williams, who, in satisfaction of the debt, claims either the house or Conchas, Sanchez' daughter. To avoid forfeiting either, Sanchez sells the place to a man who lives at some distance. While returning with the money, Sanchez is attacked with heart failure and is found by Ned Shannon, a reformed gambler. Sanchez instructs Shannon to deliver the money to his daughter and dies without telling him how to reach her or what her name is.

Some time later Shannon becomes intoxicated and loses the money to some card sharps. Awaking in the morning, he is horrified by what he has done. In the money pouch he finds a picture on which is written "My gal." He wanders into one of Mexico Williams' gambling halls and there finds a young girl placing her money on the roulette wheel.

In her desire to obtain some money to pay her father's debt, Concha had been prompted to gamble in the hope of making a lucky guess. At the time Ned appears she has lost most of her money. He recognizes her as the girl whose picture he has, and offers to place her money for her, claiming he knows the inside points of the game as he had once ran that very table.

Concha agrees, and in a short time has back a great deal more than the amount she had lost. From the balcony Mexico Williams has seen the whole affair and attempts to shoot Shannon, but is prevented by Pedro, Shannon's companion. In his anxiety to wreak vengeance on Pedro, the Mexican exposes himself to the crowd below and falls mortally wounded.

The picture ends showing Pedro hiding his face, trying not to intrude on Ned and Concha, whom he knows are deeply in love.

THE first picture of the Buster Brown series, "Buster and His Goat," is to be released on August 26 and is 500 feet in length.

The characters, made famous by Cartoonist Outcault, are as lively, mischievous, and entertaining in motion pictures as they proved to be in newspaper comic sections. There is no story in the picture, it being just the filming of childish pranks which are pages out of the life of the vivacious Buster.

Though not meant to interest grown-ups, there is a something different in them that amuses, probably the entire absence of well worked out complications, or it may be that they remind one of the days when they were not above letting their dog worry the neighbor's goat or arranging fights between their dog and the cat next door. Whatever the attraction may be, it certainly is there, and the Buster Brown series promises to become popular because of it. Buster is detailed to entertain a little boy, the son of one of his mother's friends. The pair, accompanied by Mary Jane and faithful Tige, buy some whiskers and return home wearing them. They meet Buster's goat, who immediately gets into a fight with Tige. On arriving home the goat takes offense at the others wearing whiskers and clears out the house. After being chased by the goat and butted through the window, Buster resolves that "It was some goat."

Lauder Film Lost

The Celebrated Players Film Company of Chicago announces the loss of the one reel Harry Lauder film of the "Comedy Golf Game." The picture showed at the Regent Theater, 6746 Sheridan Road, Chicago, on June 16, and was reported returned to the office of the Celebrated Players Film Company about 12:30 the same night. The employee of the Regent Theater who was entrusted with the film asserts that he left it in the elevator of the Schiller building on the night above mentioned, since which time no one connected with the Celebrated Players Film Company has seen the film. All theater managers are warned to be on their guard against doing any business with this copy of the one reel Harry Lauder "Comedy Golf Game," because the Celebrated Players Film Company owns the exclusive rights of exhibition for the entire United States.

"The Man o' Warsman" in Preparation

"The Man o' Warsman" is the new feature film now in preparation by the Photoplay Productions Company, which has offices in the Knickerbocker building, New York. The story was originally one of the Spanish-American war, but has been modernized to fit the Mexican situation. Thomas E. Shea, who was featured in the stage version of the story, is taking the leading male role in the film and is also directing the production, assisted by O. A. Matthews. Dixie Compton has the feminine lead. The Army and Navy Club of Washington, D. C., will furnish the principal locale for the story and there will be New York scenes and some to be made in Mexico. The film will be ready for an advance showing early in August. David Young is the president of the Broadway Productions Company, Thomas E. Bowers, treasurer, and Mr. Vernon, general manager.

Sans Grease Paint and Wig

By Mabel Condon

James Kirkwood.

JAMES KIRKWOOD has red hair that is not "fiery" and a disposition that strictly forbids his worrying about anything. However, his hair used to be of that peculiar brightness referred to above, but that was when he was a small boy and it was a great help to him because it provided him with constant cause for battle with the other small boys who scrambled to manhood in "the wilds of Michigan." That's Mr. Kirkwood's description of his birthplace, though goodness knows, Grand Rapids itself, where the bright-hued James first saw light, is anything but wild. With its mahogany and quarter-sawed oak and circassian walnut reputation, not to mention its unions and picture houses, it is a most peaceable and civilized city.

Well, that was where James Kirkwood, now Famous Players' director and actor, played around when he was a kid and developed the ambition and health and strength that sent him to New York when he was twenty. He had a purpose in coming; he wanted to go on the stage and decided there was no place like New York to help him attain this object, so he just said good-bye to the folks and went. And there was no band out to meet him, when he stepped off the train and rescued his bag from an obtrusive porter. Nobody seemed to know that he had arrived and the tall boy from Michigan set out to remedy this omission on the part of the fraternity he intended to join.

The fact that he didn't know anybody in the theatrical profession, or in any other profession in New York, didn't bother him any. He just began asking for a job on the stage and something about him, his red hair probably, got it for him—at last.

"I was the first one to join the company—it was a repertoire company—and I was the last one to leave it," recounted he of the flame-colored kinky locks and the disposition that is happy. "The only reason I left was because it stranded."

"And then what did you do?" I promped. One has to prompt Mr. Kirkwood for as soon as he says something he stops. It didn't seem to occur to him that I would want to know the "and then" of everything. Or maybe he did know it and because he doesn't like newspaper and magazine people—he considers them "terrible creatures"—would stop purposely at interesting moments.

"I came back to New York." And with a retrospective shake of his head, added "Terrible times I've had in New York—terrible!"

"Yes?" I prepared to hear at least one or two of the terrible times.

"Yes, I've entertained the boys, whole evenings with stories of some of the hard times I've had in New York. Terrible."

"Well!"

I compromised with my curiosity and decided that I would be satisfied with the hearing of so much as one terrible time.

"But I never let any of them make me blue and I was never sorry I came to New York. Despair must be an awful thing—awful; don't you think so?"

Since he asked me, I did; though I had made up my mind not to agree with him on anything, as long as he was so secretive. Then a shirt-sleeved man appeared from around the corner of a set and asked Mr. Kirkwood how he wanted something placed and with a relieved look Mr. Kirkwood rose quickly from his wooden-backed chair and—

Would I excuse him?

I would.

And while he was gone I tried to sit back in the wooden-backed chair that was mine—but it was one of those chairs from which the back slopes away so far that were one so unfortunate as to finally reach it, one would wish she hadn't.

In less than a minute he of the hair and disposition returned and crossed the studio in about half the steps that a person who was not from the "wilds of Michigan" would have taken. And anyone who has been there—to the studio—knows how wide the Famous Players studio is.

"As long as you didn't know anything about the stage, what made you decide to adopt it?" I wanted to know, and added, "And you being from Michigan, too!"

"Oh, we had amateur plays, where I came from in Michigan, and besides I read Shakespeare. I didn't know what I was reading about at the time but I liked the sound of it."

"And how about motion pictures?" There may have been triumph in the question but the man from Michigan answered calmly:

"It was after two years with Henry Miller in 'The Great Divide'." He reconsidered: "No, it was later than that; it was after two years with David Belasco's 'Girl of the Golden West', with Blanche Bates, that I visited a friend I had not seen for a long time. He was at the Biograph studio and while I was there they were making some retakes and invited me in. I was interested, when I saw the pictures, and they offered me work there and as my season on the stage was up, I took it. I stayed six months. That was five years ago and I've quit and gone back on the stage three times. But the last time was the last time.. The monotony of it would never satisfy me, after pictures," he decided picking up my umbrella from the deal table beside us.

"And what about going back, after that first six months?" I asked, hoping the blue cord on the handle of the umbrella was strong, for I knew the long fingers playing with it were.

"I went to the Reliance company; and I went as a director. Mr. Bauman—Charles Bauman—said he thought I could direct. I didn't think so but tried and—Well, I like it." He held the umbrella at attention and smoothed its cover.

"I forget how long I stayed there, but I only played in two pictures; and when I went back to the Biograph I directed entirely. 'Class-Mates', and 'Strongheart' were under my direction. But if you're going to mention any titles, I have one request to make."

He embarrassedly made it while digging imaginary holes in the studio floor with the umbrella. This time I hoped the frame was substantial. I regretted it had not been made for mountain climbing or—

"Just this," requested Mr. Kirkwood, "that you say I directed 'The House of Discord'. It was only two reels but I liked it." And relieved, he replaced the umbrella on the table; and I felt relieved.

"And after the Biograph—the Reliance, again?" I guessed aright.

"Yes, and then the coast."

"But of course you're glad you're back in New York."

"Of course; not that California isn't great, but New York is greater. They all think that out there. There are splendid opportunities, but—if it were only New York! Just before I left about eighteen of the boys gave me a dinner. They all wished me God-speed, yet they almost cursed me for the good fortune of coming back. It was pathetic."

"And you came and your first Famous Players' film was 'The Eagle's Mate'," again I was the prompter, and with results. for the tall one who could lean against the back of his chair and be comfortable, replied:

"Yes; but I don't intend to appear in any more films."

I thought it a most unfortunate decision for him to have reached and I told him it was; especially when the public had taken so strong a liking to him in the role of "the Eagle." That was because he is the rough-and-ready type of man and "the Eagle" would not have looked natural had he not been played by one of that type.

"Well," he conceded, "the role called for raw-boned type and that's why I took it. But I don't believe in a director acting in and directing his own pictures, for there are little things bound to creep into the picture that he would correct, were he in a position to notice them. I'm playing in the picture we're putting on now, 'Behind the Scenes;' but that's because I created the role on the stage. But that will be my last appearance in my own pictures, and, as directing is so much more interesting than acting, I intend to direct."

And he means what he says, I guess, unless another role comes along that calls for raw bones when, perhaps, James Kirkwood will volunteer the use of himself.

"It's too bad," I commiserated as I claimed my umbrella and deserted the hard chair with the back that might as well not have been there. Then Mary Pickford emerged from a dressing room carrying a round little baby that was to be used in a scene, after a while. Mr. Kirkwood pronounced the baby good looking and sure to have brains.

"Bound to—he has red hair," he said and then requested, "please don't let people imagine I'm conceited!"

"How," I remembered to ask almost at the door, "am I to tell anybody anything about you without a picture of you?" So he dampened a brush which laid flat his bushy hair and and sat for his picture. And you see the result.

Makes Friends with Elephant

Adele Lane of the Selig Polyscope, who has just appeared in her first animal picture is an excellent rider and she vacillates between her affection for her mount and for her automobile. She says that she was not at all nervous whilst acting with the animals and does not mind what she does but she has a partiality for dramatic work and prefers it even to comedy at which class of acting she is delightful. The big Selig elephant took quite a fancy to Miss Lane and this is unusual, for he dislikes new faces as a rule and Miss Lane's face is new to him, for she has never played before in dramas in which he took part.

O'Moore to Rest

Barry O'Moore has completed his contract with the Edison Company and intends to take a rest at his estate at Shandakin, Nester county, New York. Mr. O'Moore is probably best known in his characterization of Octavius in the detective comedy series of that name, and whose releases are greatly in demand. Versatility is one of his greatest assets, for while a big success in comedy his work in drama is much above the ordinary. One of the proofs of this is his portrayal of Nelson Wales in "The Man Who Disappeared" series. As there are still three more of the "Octavius" pictures to be made, Mr. O'Moore does not expect to get away before August 1. His plans for the future are not yet announced, but it is expected that September 1 will see Barry O'Moore back in the limelight with renewed vitality to put into the work that has made him a universal favorite.

Who's Who in the Film Game

Facts and Fancies About a Man You Know or Ought to Know

YOU would never suspect that a shrinking violet would grow so large, to begin with, nor is it reasonable to presume that one must beg for a year to get a film man's photograph. These film men believe almost to a man that everything and everybody should be photographed, clear down to their own offspring, but they rarely stop long enough for the camera man to get them. For instance, here is Ira Lowry. You have seen him in his shirt sleeves talking to Pop Lubin and that was all due to a camera man's carelessness. Lowry was mussed up a bit and played his part in the every-day occurrence. Fortunately, his hat was off and the trade had that one glimpse of Lubin's chief executive.

Can all but Qualify in the Giant Class.

Ira Lowry has finally had his picture taken and it looms large, beginning about here and extended east by south east. You behold a top portion of a tall blonde who will never find a two hundred scale to weigh him. Ira Lowry can all but qualify in the giant class when it comes right down to a matter of bulk. He combs his hair straight back from his massive brow but it refuses to stay put. You can comb it straight back or straight up or straight forward, but it flys back into those cute little waves that are always in evidence. It is always just like that. Lowry's curls are a part of him. They reflect the ripples of his general good nature. His eyes are sapphire blue—to match his birthstone and to harmonize with the aforesaid good nature.

Lowry had the motion picture wished on him. He wasn't born to it as some of his fellows—he married it. There are no regrets and there's a bit of romance in the story. For be it known Ira M. Lowry was born in the Quaker City, attended the city schools and after that he had Pennington Seminary and Swarthmore College. When he was only seventeen he had acquired the Philadelphia habit of week-ending at Atlantic City and it was during one of those holidays that he met Siegmund Lubin's younger daughter. The introduction came about during a tennis match. Lowry's weakness is his fondness for tennis and Mr. Lubin's daughter was the first girl who had shown him anything but a one-sided match. Well, you know tennis. When a boy and a girl begins to keep score in the running up of love one, love all, the result can be quickly determined. Miss Lubin's proficiency at the game won Lowry's immediate favor. The friendship formed on the court inspired mutual understanding and Mr. and Mrs. Lubin concurred in the young folks' plans. It was Mr. Lubin's suggestion, however, that wished the film business upon his son-in-law to be. He invited Lowry to serve his apprenticeship in filmdom at the Lubin plant, devoting all the spare time possible at the occupation. Lowry did this. His college days ended when he received his degrees at nineteen and his permanent duties began as assistant manager of the studio and factory. In October of the same year he married Miss Lubin.

Ira M. Lowry is twenty-five years young. He has been the active, managing head of the Lubin Manufacturing Company for more than a year, the responsibilities being added gradually through the seven years he has been active about the place. Credited in large part to Mr. Lowry was the purchase of Betzwood — the magnificent estate which has become such a vital part of the "Clear as a Bell" films. This property, as most of you know serves the double capacity of an important setting for films and provides the show-place home of both the Lubin and Lowry families, for the Lowry union is responsible for three-year-old Emily Lubin Lowry whose birthday is July 5. Emily Lubin Lowry takes after her father and her mother. Her hair is blonde and curly and her eyes are blue and she likes to dance. The dancing is claimed as a mother trait for Mrs. Lowry, next to tennis, prefers dancing.

Ira M. Lowry, in his capacity of Lubin's manager, is the youngest member of the licensed group of film manufacturers. He is tremendously active, agreeable among his associates, charming in his manners and speech and a delightful host. His office is on the third floor of the Lubin studio at Philadelphia where he is never too busy to grant an audience.

Some Pathe Educationals

Hunts, lots of them, have been shown in pictures, but none of them that quite takes in the points that are shown in "A Russian Boar Hunt," a Pathe-Freres split reel feature released on July 14.

From a sportsmanship view, the hunt breaks all the laws of fairness which this country accords the hunted beast, but that only adds another touch of reality to the film, as it is typical of the country in which the picture was taken, Russia.

The picture starts with the royal party gathering to be assigned their places for "the drive," which is the real name and character of the hunt. The places of best advantage are assigned to the highest titled in the party. When all are located in the different blinds the beaters start the game in the woods and drive it past the hunters' hiding places. Those that escape the gauntlet are then chased until shot or wounded.

The best part of the picture is the chase of a wild boar which has managed to get past the blinds uninjured. He is seen at intervals in the pursuit through the woods until he finally enters a small pond and swims across directly before the camera. The bullets are seen striking in the water all around him, but unhit, he emerges from the water within plain sight of the camera. When fairly up on shore a bullet finds him and the chase is over. The photography throughout is good and clear, but in parts the exceptionally fine views indicate a most active and experienced camera man.

Another interesting Pathe is entitled "Through Bosnia and Dalmatia." Southern Austria, at once quaint and picturesque, holds forth many joys for the traveler who delights especially in rambling through those portions of the world that lie away from the beaten path. Of particular interest is the curious little town of Bistrick, in Bosnia, which, although now under Austrian rule, was, up to 1875, possession of the Turks.

Bistrick's bustling market place is now a point of interest and amusement for all visitors. The old Turkish quarter, with its oddly shaped houses and narrow streets, typical of the days when Turkey ruled in Bosnia, never fails as an attraction, while the Isle of Lacrome, situated on a crystal lake with high wooded hills about it, reminds one of some half-forgotten story out of the Arabian nights.

The Port of Spalata, with its varied craft and stevedores, is the principal commercial center of Dalmatia. Farther back from the water front, in the beautiful mountainous country, surrounding the quaint old town of Eidelitze, springs the source of the River Bosnia. Like all southern European countries, Bosnia has its share of ruins. Those at Spalata, called by the Romans Salomia, force a serious thought and in their stern architecture impressively remind one of the ancient times when the mighty Rome ruled the world.

New Pathe Star

A forthcoming feature release by Pathe that is bound to cause comment is the five part film "The Taint," now in the making. Not only is the story one to arouse a great deal of interest—it is said to be one of the strongest ever handled by Pathe—but the new picture will serve to introduce a new screen star, Miss Ruby Hoffman. Mr. Frank Powell, who is directing the new feature is responsible for Miss Hoffman's entry into the motion picture world. That the director made a ten-strike in the matter of his selection, there is small doubt, for she is one of the most beautiful women that the motion picture camera has "caught." A brunette in type, she makes an ideal subject. In addition, however, to her personal charms, Miss Hoffman has made quite a name for herself on the legitimate stage and in vaudeville. It was her splendid appearance that first attracted Daniel Frohman two years ago, when he produced "Detective Keen" in vaudeville, and Miss Hoffman stood out strongest in a cast of Frohman players. Like many others she began as a stock actress and was leading woman for Eugenie Blair for several seasons. She then came under the notice of William A. Brady, that manager giving her an important role in the road company of "A Gentleman From Mississippi." This was followed by two engagements under Wagenhals and Kemper, playing in "The Woman In The Case" and in "Seven Days," doing Florence Reed's part in the latter play. Until lately Miss Hoffman has been seen in several clever vaudeville sketches, along dramatic lines. But like many other clever folk of the stage the call of the camera reached her and she wisely harkened to the call.

Ruby Hoffman.

Advance of Utah Film Pioneers

Out in Utah a band of film men headed by H. A. Sims and including Albert Scowcroft and Charles Ziemer, all of whom are well known in western motion picture circles as pioneers of the industry, have been steadily pushing their way forward until they now own a string of theaters throughout the state, all of which are a credit to any locality. Their first adventure, a little theater on an out of the way street in Ogden, is quite a contrast to their latest accomplishment, the opening of a de luxe house on the main street of Salt Lake City, with a seating capacity of three thousand.

The General Film Company announces that the release date for George Kleine's big feature, "Vendetta," from the novel by Marie Corelli, has been set for Tuesday, September 1.

PERSONAL NOTES.

He's the man who buys advertising space with an agate ruler for the Progressive Motion Picture Corporation, in suite 509, the Times building. Fred L. Bennage, first and foremost, is an advertising man, but this in no way reflects upon his ability to spread publicity regarding the product of the concern that has Harry Carey at its head. Rather, it abets it. Years in the service of big advertising agencies have added to the natural tendency Mr. Bennage originally displayed toward telling one-half of the world all about the other half—this through the medium of magazine advertising. And Mr. Bennage can tell you the line rate of any big periodical. Service with the Gaumont company in London began Mr. Bennage's experience in the way of films. Europe was his workshop for a number of years. It was Philadelphia, however, that gave him his right to American citizenship and other favors, and he still pays tribute to that city by way of frequent visits. The vice-presidency and general managership of the Interstate Publishing Company, dealing in house organs, occupied Mr. Bennage for a time and was followed by his affiliation with the National Amusement Company in the role of general manager. This connection was splendid preparation for his present work with the Progressive Company, for it entailed the overseeing of sixty-seven theaters as well as the production end. "The Master Cracksman" is the six-part Progressive release that has been sent on its successful tour of picture houses with the publicity aids of Mr. Bennage. And the "Bussy Izzy" series, now in the course of making, is soon to follow. Perhaps no busier man is known to the film industry than Fred L. Bennage. And certainly no pleasanter.

Aaron Michael Gollos was born just 28 years ago—1886 being the year and Chicago the place. He had the same sort of a life as every boy born in the city, which means the daily fights around the school yard over the marble games, and in spite of the determination of the teachers to frown upon him he succeeded in graduating from the public schools, later attending Washington University at St. Louis, where he took an electrical course. He became attracted to the motion picture business and left the university in 1904, coming to Chicago, where he opened a small theater on the south side. As time went on, profits of this theater and the organizing ability of the man resulted in his owning eleven more theaters, giving him twelve in all, which he operated until 1912, when, selling six of the theaters, he opened a feature film exchange in the Powers building and purchased a good line of features which he rented to exhibitors as well as to himself. Early this year Mr. Gollos incorporated a half million dollar company in New York known as the M. G. H. Company, the "M" standing for the name McKenzie (Lady McKenzie being a well known African lion hunter and all-around sportswoman), "G" standing for Gollos, and "H" for Hatterly. This is a New York corporation and Lady McKenzie is at present in Africa engaged in hunting wild animals and taking film pictures. She has already used 15,000 feet of negative stock and another shipment of 15,000 feet has been forwarded to her. In a recent letter Lady McKenzie stated that the pictures were excellent and that the value of the furs she would bring out would be enormous. While Mr. Gollos was in New York he was attracted to the splendid work being done by the Photoplay Productions Company on a wonderously popular dramatic performance entitled, "The Littlest Rebel," and purchased the rights for Wisconsin and Illinois on this picture. Coming back to Chicago, he organized the Photoplay Productions Releasing Company to purchase and release big five and six-reel productions, and it is through this latter company that "The Littlest Rebel" will be released. Last year Mr. Gollos had the Hippodrome at San Souci Park seating 5,000 people, and it was one of the most successful concessions in the park. He has been riding around to see his exhibitor patrons in an electric coupe, but has just placed his order for a 1915 Cadillac, which will be delivered to him next week, so if any of our readers happen to see the good looking face reproduced herewith behind the steering wheel of a pretty classy looking car next week they will recognize him.

H. Oliver Bodine became interested in photography twelve years ago while doing special photographic work for national publications and large corporations in the Middle West. He located in Racine, Wisconsin, a city of 40,000 and in three years built up one of the largest photo supply businesses in the country. The next three years he spent as advertising and sales manager of the Wallensak Optical Company, manufacturers of photographic lenses and shutters, at Rochester, and during the last six months has been in charge of sales and advertising for the Raw Film Supply Company. Mr. Bodine is an acknowledged expert on photographic chemistry and has a tremendous acquaintance in the photographic trade. He has written many articles on various branches of photography and been awarded many cups and medals for the work he has turned out. He expects to leave shortly for an extended trip through Europe, taking up while there the technical end of the motion picture industry and being accorded special favors by such famous concerns as the Actien Gesellschaft fur Antlin Fabrikation and Belgium Company, and L. Gevaert & Company, as well as other large producing companies of France, Italy and Germany. This experience will round out his knowledge of the photographic branch of the motion picture industry and upon his return to the United States he can say in all truth that he is thoroughly posted on all branches of the business both from a technical and a practical standpoint.

Mr. Holliday, formerly of the Gaumont Company, has converted property at Woodside into a picture studio and will begin the immediate manufacture of films.

"Tie your dog outside" is one of the Reliance studio's rules. Recently Dorothy Gish and Mae Marsh were working in a scene together, and in compliance with the rule had tied their dogs outside, but not out of sight of each other. In some way the pets managed to get loose, and in less than no time a catch-as-catch-can fight was in full sway. Under Griffith's direction a high pressure stream of water was used to good advantage in making peace between the terriers.

Daniel Frohman likes to see good pitcures as well as make them. He is present at all the pre-release showings in the Famous Players projection room, and volunteers his share of the chaffing remarks which are to be made should any of the cast happen to be present.

Edward Earle's entrance into Edison pictures was not in the usual way, that of being rescued from the footlights. To oblige a friend and for the novelty it contained he worked in one of the Edison talking pictures. At the completion of the picture he realized that, rather than being a pastime, the industry of the screen was a serious one, so serious, in fact, that he now spends much of his spare time rummaging through books in the libraries getting an insight of the game from every angle.

Fan Bourke and Helen Badgely have the same dressing room at the Thanhouser studio. Unless Helen has changed lately, Miss Bourke is kept pretty busy, for one of the "kidlet's" favorite pastimes is drawing pictures just where and when the inspiration seizes her, whether it be a scenario, photograph, or blue-print that happens to be handiest.

Frank Wood, only recently from England, has appeared in some of the big features of the day and is not through yet. His latest appearance was in the five-reel Regent feature, "La Belle Rousse." Previous to this he took important roles in the Life Photo's "The Banker's Daughter" and the Colonial's "The Seats of the Mighty." Mr. Wood received much good-natured comment on his spendthrift and careless ways at the caste's review of "La Belle Rousse," all of which he discounted with a broad smile.

Albert W. Hale, who was formerly connected with the Universal Company on the Pacific Coast, has been appointed producing manager of the Santa Monica studios of the Kalem Company.

"Peter the Great" has fallen. It is not exactly a historical event, but Miss Marguerita Fischer's bull dog who answers to that name considers it highly important. The fall came when said dog tried to walk on a miniature lake, near the "Beauty" studios in California, last week only to find that the lilly leaves which covered the surface would not bear his weight.

Thomas Nash of the Nash Motion Picture Company and his eastern representative Stanly H. Twist, leave Los Angeles this week arriving in New York on July 21. Mr. Nash brings with him the first release under the "'Big' Otto Brand," a four reel animal picture entitled, "The Mysterious Man of the Jungle." During Mr. Nash's stay in New York his headquarters will be with the Inter-Ocean Sales Company, 110 West Fortieth street.

John C. Davis, for three years Treasurer of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the State of New York, died at his home in Saugerties on July 5. He was well known and exceedingly popular with his fellow showmen throughout the state and Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Utica and Albany sent representatives to attend the funeral services.

A number of the players from the western Eclair Company, located at Tucson, Ariz., attended the "Frontier Day Celebration," one of the biggest events of the year in that state, which was held at Prescott. The players participated in many of the events and filmed the greater part of celebration.

A forty-inch sand filter with a capacity of fifteen hundred gallons an hour has been installed in the laboratory at the Universal Pacific Coast studio at Hollywood, Cal. The drying room has also been enlarged and a new eleven-foot drum installed. While digging one of three wells to receive the chemical discharge from the new laboratory the floor of the well gave way, exposing a subterranean stream of water, which up to that time had given absolutely no evidence of existence. A laborer narrowly escaped death.

ROLL OF STATES.

MISSOURI.

W. L. Gleason has sold the Bijou theater in Brookfield, to John Foster, and has bought the Maywood theater at 833 Osage avenue, Kansas City.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believoing tbe classification of film pictures by tbe nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their hulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in MOTOGRAPHY as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

Flo LaBadie as the heroine in "The Million Dollar Mystery."

Intensely Dramatic

Every episode—every scene—of The Million Dollar Mystery throbs with human emotion. The intensely dramatic situations cleverly portrayed by beautiful Florence LaBadie are exceptional examples of the motion picture art.

THE MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY

By Harold MacGrath

Thanhouser's Million Dollar Motion Picture Production

The most exciting thrills in this stupendous production are still to come. Under-water pictures, Flo LaBadie's dive off an ocean liner, a fire at sea, the dash of an automobile over a cliff—these are a few of the thrills coming. Remember, $10,000 will be paid for the best 100-word solution of The Million Dollar Mystery.

2-reel episodes of The Million Dollar Mystery are now being released every week. The Million Dollar Mystery is an independent release and may be obtained regardless of the regular program being used.

Edison Films "My Friend From India"

Walter Perkins Featured

A THREE-REEL screen version of "My Friend From India" is to be Edison's release of August 15. And it enjoys the distinction of being one of the best comedies that that company has ever produced. It contains humor in every foot, and exhibitors will undoubtedly find it one of the best laugh-getters they have ever booked.

One of the comedy bits in Edison's "My Friend From India."

While most of its merriment is contained in the interpretations of the different characters, the humorous complications and awkwardly embarrassing situations, there are several stunts which have been performed before, but which, because of their difficulties and the opportunities for introducing new wrinkles in them, never fail to amuse, if accomplished correctly and smoothly.

One of these, for instance, is the trick of having two persons who look and dress alike go through a series of movements, one before a mirror frame and the other behind it, their actions coinciding exactly. Returning after some time to get another view in the mirror, the person who had stood before it discovers that the glass has been removed.

The play is one which was successfully presented for several years on the legitimate stage. Walter Perkins, who also plays the lead in the filmed play, in the role of Augustus Keen Shaver, appeared in the original about 2,167 times, and with the exception of his first scene could not improve on his characterization of the theosophist had he played it twice that many times. In his first appearance before the camera Mr. Perkins showed a slight tendency to look at the director, but this he soon overcomes. He afterwards said that nothing in all his stage career ever frightened him as did that first appearance before the camera.

The rest of the cast is composed of popular Edison stars, Augustus Phillips taking the part of Charlie Underholt, the real cause of all the trouble; Robert Brower playing Mr. Underholt, Charlie's father and the owner of a keen desire to break into exclusive society; Cora Williams characterizing Arabella, Mr. Underholt's sister, an ambitious old maid in search of a husband; Sally Crute playing Marian Hayste, Charlie's sweetheart; the charming Underholt girls, Bernice and Gertie, being played by Bliss Milford and Viola Dana; William Sadler playing the part of Bernice's earnest suitor, Tom Valentine; Henry Tomlinson portraying the sad-faced, gawky Reverend James Tweedle; and Edward O'Connor completing the cast in the role of Jennings.

Ashley Miller directed the picture and is automatically rewarded by the successful result of his careful and untiring efforts to produce the best that the story contained.

Charlie Underholt, on awaking after a "big" night, is dumfounded to see a stranger sleeping beside him. He has a faint recollection of having met him the night before, and knowing his father would cut off his allowance if he thought that his son drank, Charlie admonishes Augustus Keen Shaver not to give away his secret and introduces his strange acquaintance as "my friend from India."

Laughable situations pile one upon another in Edison's "My Friend From India."

At the time of his introduction, Shaver, through no fault of his own, is clad only in pajamas and a filmy bedroom robe, Charlie having hidden his clothes. This garb he is forced to wear continually, both to prevent his escaping and to add weirdness to his demonstrations of occultism, for Charlie has represented him as being a theosophist, because his father is anxious to become known as a believer of theosophy since society has taken it up.

Mr. Underholt becomes curious about the theosophist's name, and Charlie picks up a paper, turns to the announcements of the late arrivals from India, and points out the name, Reverend James Tweedle. Mr. Underholt immediately sends out invitations to a reception in honor of the Reverend Mr. Tweedle.

The owner of that name reads of the reception and calls to protest, but is unheeded. All attention is centered upon Shaver, whose powers are already in evidence. To anything that looks the least bit mysterious but one answer is given—Tweedle.

On the night of the reception Charlie and a friend, Tom Valentine decide to impersonate the real Reverend Tweedle and denounce him as an impostor. The chums do not confide their intentions to each other and when Tweedle arrives they stand one on either side of him. When Mr. Underholt, his daughters and sister next look for the three Tweedles they are gone. The pajama-clad guest has wonderful power!

While waiting for the guests Charlie proposes to the others that they turn the theosophist's powers loose on his father. Mr. Underholt is told by the bogus Tweedle that he is intoxicated. As he walks through the house he is met by his relatives and servants, who gaze at him horrified and murmur things about his never having been drunk before.

When he attempts to apologize he is told of the numerous consents to marriages he has given while intoxicated. Convinced that it is true, he agrees to the marriage of Charlie to Marian Hayste, Bernice to Tom Valentine, and Arabella to the real Reverend Tweedle. Just then the servant girl comes in with the invitations to the reception—they had never been mailed.

Free at last, Augustus Keen Shaver, alias James Tweedle, dons his street clothes and makes haste to put distance between himself and the house that he firmly believes shelters lunatics.

ON AUGUST 21 the Edison Company will release a two-reel comedy that deserves to be classed among the "different" ones. The plot is unusual and filled with action.

It takes its title, "The Gilded Kidd," from the ineffectual attempts of Harry Kidd, a rich man's son, to be arrested. The situations are novel, and the incidents of the story which at first seem only a subject for comedy contain a good bit of truth.

The photography and settings are up to standard, the scenes at the reception being especially good. Careful direction has taken care of the small details which gives a finished touch of completeness to the picture.

The principals of the cast are: Arthur Houseman as Harry Kidd, the son of the great financier, K. K. Kidd, whose face and reputation are familiar to every policeman within a large radius of the Kidd residence; Edward Earle as Tom Graham, a young fellow who does not believe in the partiality shown the richer class, and Kidd's rival for the hand of Elsie Lucas (Elsie MacLeod), a charming young girl who disapproves of Harry Kidd's extravagant and reckless ways.

The story begins with a demonstration of Kidd's influence with the police. He and two friends take a clothing dummy from in front of a store, and at the corner are met by a policeman who threatens arrest until he recognizes Harry. That changes things greatly and he releases the boys after taking the dummy from them.

At the club that night one of Harry's friends points out an article in the paper about a tramp being arrested for stealing a dummy. Much comment arises about the separate laws for the rich and the poor, and Tom Graham makes the remark that "Kidd wouldn't be arrested if he stole the park." Harry takes exception to the statement and wagers that he can be arrested and put in jail within three days.

The bet is accepted, the stake being a promise from the loser not to visit Elsie Lucas, with whom both are in love, for a period of six months.

The first two days Harry becomes absolutely disgusted with his attempts to be arrested for breaking the peace. He bumps into policeman, treads on their corns, breaks windows, and threatens to commit suicide, but without the desired result. Instead he is smiled at and assured that it is all right. His most disappointing experience is when he sees a tramp arrested for sleeping on a bench in the park. He hurries to take his place, and a short time afterwards an officer of the law comes along, recognizes him as Banker Kidd's son, and borrows the shade from a baby carriage to place over his head.

His last day at hand, Harry visits the jail and begs to be accepted, but is refused. Passing a window he is hailed by one of the prisoners. His face brightens with an idea. An arrangement is made with the jailer to let him take Bill Nabb's place in jail for one day. Graham is notified and comes to visit Kidd. Sure enough he is in jail, but as he wasn't arrested he does not fill the terms of the contract.

In company with a woman's club Elsie Lucas visits the jail and sees her two suitors in one of the cells. The turnkey points out the seated one, Kidd, as being a man in for breach of promise. The boys discover Elsie and Tom walks out of the cell. Harry attempts to follow, but is reminded that he is to stay until Nabb's return. Outside of the cell Tom and Elsie laugh at the enraged prisoner.

A loser all around, Harry gets impatient about staying in jail a whole day, and on complaining to the jailer is handed a telegram which reads: "I ain't never coming back. Forward my mail to Canada. Bill Nabb."

Government Employe Faces Prison

Famous Players Release

THE grinding, mechanical-like system of the United States Treasury and its protecting secret service is given a personal touch and interest in "The Little Gray Lady," produced by the Famous Players Company in four reels.

This grim, appalling money vehicle, whose wheels wear out and age its employes, and mercilessly destroy the unfaithful ones, is here represented as having a heart and sparing a susceptible, misled youth whose extravagant tastes have caused him to live beyond his means. Forced by his inability to meet his debts, he misuses the trust of his position in the treasury department and becomes enmeshed in the net of disgrace.

Wonderful scenery lends an air of strength and dignity to the picture. Few views of the capitol are seen that can compare with the one used to represent the height of the youth's ambition, a view taken from Pennsylvania avenue, showing the long path lined with trees and bushes, at the end of which looms the capitol building, stately and beautiful. Numerous street scenes are embraced in the exteriors, several of which have the treasury itself for the background.

"Did you ever see this bill before?"

Two interiors that are especially remarkable in their size, atmosphere and completeness are those of the cafe and the treasury examining department. The photography is of high quality and the positions for exterior scenes well chosen.

As Anna Gray, "the little gray lady," Jane Grey's personality and quiet sincerity at once appeal to and enlist the sympathies of the watcher. It is unfortunate that the story necessitates such a weak-willed, spineless type of American youth in one of the leading roles as Perry Carlyle. If he were a desperate criminal one could admire him for his defiance, but since his actions inspire nothing but impatience or disgust it is proof that James Cooley has played the role to its fullest extent. Jane Fearnley's interpretation of Ruth Jordon's powers of fascination and influence is well done. Hal Clarendon plays the part of the generous, likable detective, Sam Meade. Julia Walcott characterizes the hospitable Mrs. Jordan. Robert Cummings, as Richard Graham, is a big, purposeful type of man. As Mrs. Carlyle, Sue Balfour impresses one as being a fond-hearted mother whose one pleasure is her son Perry. The roles of Mrs. Graham and John Moore are played by Kathaleen Aamold and Edgar Davenport.

Perry Carlyle and Anna Gray are constant companions in their home town in Ohio and there exists between them an accepted understanding as to their future. Both of them take examinations for positions in the treasury department in Washington, and Perry, because of his high average, is appointed at once.

After some time Anna receives a letter from Perry telling her of a vacancy in his section and advising her to apply personally. She arrives in Washington and is appointed immediately, but does not derive the happiness to which she had looked forward in being near Perry, for he has changed considerably since leaving home. One of the girls in the department, Ruth Jordan, with whose mother both Anna and Perry board, has made the latter think she loves him and in consequence his whole salary and more is spent in her entertainment.

Anna realizes the depth of Perry's foolishness, but is unable to interfere, as her motive might be misunderstood as jealousy and only make matters worse. In the meantime Perry has contracted a large debt which he is pressed to pay. His position in the treasury department enables him to obtain pieces of bills. These he collects until he has enough to form, when pasted together, a whole bill.

The government learns of the queer bills in circulation, and in a short time the secret service men are on Perry's trail. A new boarder, Sam Meade, arrives at the Jordan house. Anna learns that he is a detective, and suspects that her lover is the one he is after.

Perry and Ruth decide to elope, and one of the queer bills is used to buy the railroad ticket. Arriving at the gate they find that the train has left. As they return home a sudden fear of discovery seizes Perry. He hurries to the depot to leave town and there meets his mother, who has come to visit him.

On his return to the Jordan home Perry is surprised by Detective Meade, and about to be arrested when Anna pleads in his behalf for the sake of his mother. At first the detective refuses, but on meeting Mrs. Carlyle he sees that her son is the one comfort of her old age and for once consideration wins precedence over the law and justice.

Perry is awakened by this undeserved kindness and accepts a position offered him in the South, where he can get a new start and live for the happiness of his mother and his "little gray lady," who is the Mrs. Perry Carlyle —to be.

Company Spends Week at Sea

To spend a week on the high seas in an antique wooden bottom ship is not the most pleasant vacation to anticipate. However, Frank Crane and his Imp company, including Alexander Gaden, Dorothy Phillips, Howard Grampton and Stuart Paton, are just returned from such a trip—and it was anything but a vacation. The players slept in rat infested berths, cooked their meals—or rather had them cooked by an "old salt"—over a smelling oil stove, and suffered all the pangs of an unruly stomach. And they worked. "On the High

Seas" is the title of the two-reel play Frank has been producing. It is from the pen of his assistant, Stuart Paton.

One of the interesting incidents of this trip—an incident that forms one of the thrillers of the play—was the fall Paton took from the bow sprit forty feet into the briny deep. Be it said that Paton held the sprint swimming championship of Scotland (his birthplace) for four years.

Novel Poster for Universal Serial

The novel effects obtained by the poster department of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company for its series of "Villon" pictures are said to surpass anything before attempted along this line by the company. The border design of the posters exemplifies French architecture and atmosphere. At the bottom of the border is a design carrying out the idea of a French parchment scroll, upon which is lettered the title of the scene and the name of the play. Inlaid in this border design is the main body of the subject matter, rich in subdued colors. There will be one "nine sheet," two "three sheet," and three "one sheet" posters for each of the pictures.

Charming Summer Resort Comedy

New "Beauty" Series

ABOUNDING in human interest and quiet but forceful humor, the release of the "Beauty" brand of the American Film Manufacturing Company for July 28, entitled "A Midsummer Love Tangle," which is the first of series of five pictures, is certain to prove popular with photoplay audiences of all classes.

Miss Margarita Fischer and Harry Pollard, who appear in the leading roles, put life and feeling into their characters and the clever manner in which they get their "business" across is decidedly charming. The love scenes in which the pair appear carry just the right amount of sentiment in them and have a strong appeal. Little Kathie Fischer, cast as the irrepressible brother of a beautiful summer girl, assumes her role in becoming fashion without overacting it, as is often the case with child players. The tricks she plays are those which would naturally come into the mind of a child, and the occasions on which she pouts and becomes angry at many little things which cross "his" path are very amusing.

Buddy tells Jack the thief is near the resort.

The entire picture was staged on the shore of a beautiful lake surrounded by mountains and the settings are decidedly artistic. The players in the support of the main characters, with the exception of Fred Gamble, who is very humorous as a judge, have little to do, but the principals manage to supply action enough to keep the interest alive every second that the film is on the screen.

The other films of this series will probably be awaited with great interest, for, while each picture is complete in itself, there will be a continued thread running through all of them and if all maintain the high quality established by this one the series will undoubtedly prove the best of the many clever attractions which have been offered the many photoplay fans who are followers of this very popular brand of pictures.

The lovers sail away without Buddy.

As the story opens Judge Lynn's family is seen at a summer resort, where they are staying during the warm months. The judge himself is unable to get away from his duties except at the end of each week, but his wife, Trixy, his charming daughter, and Buddy, his irrepressible son, are greatly enjoying themselves. Trixy is in love with a young man named Jack, who is also spending his summer at the lake.

Things are progressing nicely and no obstacle appears in the path of the lovers until Jack refuses to allow Buddy to go sailing with them, and therefore brings the wrath of the youthful tyrant down upon his head. As the boat leaves the pier Buddy tries to avenge himself by throwing everything he can find after it, but this proves very unsuccessful, so he retreats to the house to plan a campaign against the man he has now decided is his enemy.

While the lovers are sailing far out in the lake, having forgotten that anyone except the two of them exist, the judge arrives unexpectedly. The young couple return quite late, and as the family have all retired, Jack does not meet them.

The next morning the papers contain a report of a daring diamond thief who is operating near the resort and who is so clever at making up as a woman that he cannot be captured. Both the judge and Jack see the story and both determine to keep their eyes open for any sign of the lawbreaker. Trixy and Jack are going boating again and when she asks Buddy to carry her lunch from the cottage to the boat he joyfully agrees, believing that his reward will be the pleasure of a trip on the lake. He is greatly riled up, therefore, when the loving pair again ride off without him.

The day is very warm and, as his blood is boiling over the new insult, he seeks his favorite haunt to think the matter over. This haunt is an old boat, which is secured to the shore by several big chains and where Buddy has been in the habit of spending much of his time. This day the water looks so tempting that he cannot resist trying to drown his troubles by taking a swim. The judge decides to take a stroll about the resort and in the course of his wanderings comes upon Buddy, who is having the time of his life in the water. The irrepressible one is jerked to shore in a hurry and sent scurrying toward home by the excited parent. He does not go to the cottage, however, but stops on the way and lies under a shade tree and thinks over his many grievances. The judge, like Buddy, cannot stand the temptation of the water and decides to take a swim himself.

Buddy steals up while his father is splashing around and takes his clothes. The lovers out in the lake decide to try out a new gun, and one of the experimental shots comes so close to the judge that he thinks it would be a good plan to get to shore where he can escape from the bullets with more ease. He swims back to the boat, where he discovers he has been relieved of his wearing apparel. Using a piece of canvas from the boat as a covering, he makes his way to the tent of two old maids near by, and while they are absent helps themselves to some of their clothes and starts toward home.

Buddy sees his father and enjoys his appearance very much. As he watches him an idea pops into his head whereby he can be revenged on two of his prosecutors at the same time. He rushes to the landing just as Jack and Trixy return from their sail and tells Jack that the crook disguised as a woman is near by. Jack becomes all excited and starts in pursuit with his rifle, thus becoming a hero in Trixy's eyes.

Buddy leads him to his father, and Jack, never having met the judge, is certain he has captured the criminal, as Trixy's father is dressed in the clothes he took from the old maids' tent. Despite the old gentleman's protestations Jack marches him to the village jail and forces the turnkey to lock him up with several bums and crooks. They then go for the sheriff to handle the prisoner, but Jack does not return to the jail with them.

This proves a lucky move for him, as the sheriff recognizes the judge and releases him, and the irate magistrate vows vengeance on the youth who has caused him all the trouble. That night Jack calls for Trixy and she takes him into the cottage to meet her family. The judge is all smiles at the prospect of meeting his future son-in-law, but the moment he recognizes Jack the storm breaks loose and for several minutes the unlucky young man is forced to dodge books, etc., until he finally succeeds in making his way out of the house.

Downhearted, he seeks the sailboat alone, but is firmly resolved that the unfortunate mistake will not separate him from Trixy. His next attempt to win her father's favor and her hand will be shown in the second of the series, "A Suspended Ceremony," to be released in the near future.

The cast is as follows:

Trixy Lynn, a summer girl.....Margarita Fischer
Jack Weston, in love with Trixy.....Harry Pollard
Buddy, Trixy's irrepressible brother.....Kathie Fischer
Judge Lynn.....Fred Gamble

Work Started on Second Production

The members of the dramatic cast of the California Motion Picture Corporation have drawn off their boots, unbuckled their pistols, stacked their sawed-off shot guns in a neglected corner and backed the antique stage coach under cover. The stage driver of yesterday has become the proud master of a circus ring and the capricious daughter of the mining camp the belle of a ramshackle outcropping to a large city. There has been a marvelous metamorphosis almost over night. Mere mustaches have given place to full grown beards and bandaged arms to peg legs. Dress, manners, ages, dispositions and physiognomies have undergone a miraculous change. All this because "Salomy Jane" has been completed and "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" has made its appearance on the studio stage.

By a contract recently closed with the Liebler Company the California Motion Picture Corporation has secured the exclusive motion picture rights to this latter play, which, through its pathos and humor, has delighted the public both as a novel and as an offering on the legitimate stage. Alice Hagan Rice, who wrote the book and collaborated on the play and who is ranked as one of the foremost of American women writers, has given advice and criticism which has been an invaluable factor in the preparation of the scenario.

Beatriz Michelena, the delightfully beautiful prima donna who played the role of Salomy Jane in the previous production, is appearing as "Lovey Mary" in "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," and House Peters has the leading male role. Andrew Robson, erstwhile "Yuba Bill" in "Salomy Jane," is playing the part of Mr. Wiggs, whose checkered career as renegade, circus ring master and repentant husband, is known the world over.

Charles Ray of the Kay Bee Company is tasting the fruits of popularity. A young lady from Wisconsin has sent Charles an oil painting of himself taken from a photograph and he is spending about half a week's salary on a frame for it.

Weird Stunts of Our Censor Board

A Growing Menace

ALL Chicago manufacturers and distributers of film are thoroughly familiar with the work being done by the Chicago Board of Censorship, and are so used to the absurd demands of the village "highbrows" for rejections and cuts in films submitted to them for approval that this story will prove of little interest to them, but the eastern manufacturer may be somewhat surprised and interested to learn what the Chicago board is doing as a daily average.

The Chicago Daily Tribune publishes each day in the week, where all who are interested can plainly read, a detailed report of the work of the censor board for the day previous, giving the names of the films cut and the reasons for either the rejection or the cutting of that particular film subject. MOTOGRAPHY has selected these reports for the first fifteen days in the month of July, these being a fair average of the work the censorship board has been doing for months past, and has carefully analyzed the rejections and cutouts made during that period.

The first analysis of the reports shows that between July 1 and July 15 there were 10 rejections and 102 cutouts ordered by the censorship board. Since two Sundays and one holiday intervened, the board was on the job but twelve days out of the fifteen, and in that brief period averaged almost one rejection per day, or eight and one-half cutouts per day. If this average were to be maintained by the board during the 313 working days of the year the film manufacturers of the country would find that more than 260 films would be completely rejected, and cutouts made in more than 2,660 reels.

Analyzing the reports in the Tribune still farther, one discovers that the rejections may be divided into four classes; those films which are released through the General Film Company's program, through the Universal, through the Mutual and through various feature distributing agencies which we may designate by the word "miscellaneous." Tabulating the rejections and cutouts in this style we find that the rejections ran as follows:

General Film program	4
Mutual program	2
Universal program	2
Miscellaneous program	2

The cutouts arranged according to the same divisions line up as follows:

General Film program	35
Miscellaneous program	28
Universal program	20
Mutual program	18

Of the films rejected there was one each of the following brands: Majestic, Klaw & Erlanger, Eclair, Keystone, Selig, Essanay, Warners, Thanhouser, Lubin and London.

The Biograph brand heads the list of the film cutouts, as eight of the Biograph films were ordered trimmed, while close behind Biograph comes Kalem and Warner with seven apiece. Essanay and Lubin follow next in order with five apiece, and then come Eclectic, Imp, Thanhouser, Vitagraph and Selig, each with four. Joker, Reliance, Broncho, Clarendon and University had cutouts in three apiece, while the following brands escaped with but two cuts: Victor, Nestor, Beauty, Majestic, Edison, American, Powers, Bison, Rex and Nordisk. The table shows Continental, Kleine-Celio, Frontier, Eclair, Milano, Ramo, Sterling, World, J. M. Meade, Film Releases of America, All Star, Blache, Arco and Domino to have had but one film cut.

The detailed Tribune reports from which the above information was gleaned run as follows:

In reel No. 2 shorten first two gambling scenes to flash to carry action and eliminate the four following gambling scenes; in third reel shorten gambling scene and eliminate sub-title, "It will mean a large fee if you perform the ceremony"; man pointing revolver at clerk.

"Wolfe; or, The Conquest of Quebec" [Kalem]. Shorten scene showing dead bodies on battlefield to flash.

"The Greatest of These" [Eclair-Universal]. Striking woman.

"A Ranch Romance" [Nestor-Universal]. Kidnaping girl and taking her into brush; struggle with girl in house; scene showing shooting of man.

"Bess, the Detectress" [Joker-Universal]. Stealing of watch.

"The Reign of Terror" [Eclectic]. Killing prison guards; shooting chevalier before queen; stabbing man at bridge; man stabbing himself in prison.

REJECTIONS.

"The Painted Lady" [Majestic-Mutual]. Permit refused because this picture is immoral and suggestive. Shows how girl murders man who sedueed her sister.

"A Man's Enemy" [Klaw & Erlanger]. Permit refused because this picture shows seven scenes of gambling, several murders, many scenes of drunkenness, acid throwing, and other objectionable scenes.

CUTOUTS.

"The Black Triangle" [Continental-Kuntz]. Kidnapers entering house through window and abdueting girl; pointing gun at girl. Change subtitle "If you wish to see your daughter alive, put $5,000," etc., to read: "If you wish to see your daughter, put $5,000," etc.

"The Cheeseville Cops" [Biograph]. Crooks stealing money.

"In Temptation's Toils" [Celio]. Shorten love scene between widow and brother-in-law.

"I Love the Nurses" [Eclectic]. Knocking down policeman with hatchet.

"The Ranger's Reward" [Frontier-Universal]. Outlaw holding up sheriff.

"Value Received" [Victor-Universal]. Man and girl entering hotel; shorten scene between father and daughter; father shooting man.

"In the Sultan's Garden" [Imp-Universal]. Shooting sailor.

"The Squatter's Gal" [Essanay]. Both scenes showing stamped envelope.

"The Fable of the Coming Champion Who Was Delayed" [Essanay]. All scenes showing ring and boxing match; bribing police officer.

"A Clash of Virtues" [Essanay]. Girl opening desk drawer.

"The Rival Railroad Plot" [Kalem]. Overpowering engineer in room; pouring chemical in water tender of engine; holdup of engineer and fireman.

New Kleine Catalogue

We are just in receipt of the twentieth edition of the Kleine Optical Company's catalogue. This booklet is a complete compendium of every accessory used in the motion picture business and quite a number of devices for use by the manufacturers of films or film exchanges.

The book, which is arranged by Frank L. Hough, Jr., shows evidences of a great deal of hard work and a thorough knowledge of the intricate detail of motion picture making and exhibiting. Mr. Hough was, for several years, with Thomas A. Edison, Inc., both in the factory and on the road, and had the opportunity of personally seeing what was essential for the exhibitor, and in making this catalog he successfully put into its pages the informative data which is absolutely necessary for the up-to-date exhibitor. A great many exhibitors throughout the country will do well to have a copy of this excellent catalog at hand all the time. They will find an almost everyday use for it.

This book contains the first published list of parts for the Edison Model D Kinetoscope and a complete list of Power's repair parts, as well as descriptions of every type of projection machine sold in America. A description of the optical system of projection machines is given in very simple language so that every exhibitor reading the article will have a comprehensive knowledge of one of the most important parts of his business. Various kinds of lenses, with their special functions carefully described, are listed. Rheostats, transformes, rotary converters, mercury arc rectifiers, compensarcs, as well as complete generating plants, are shown in full detail.

We would suggest that every exhibitor in America send for a copy of this catalogue and keep it among his reference books.

Eclair Players Move West

The entire producing force engaged in the making of American-Eclair films moved westward on Monday, July 20, to the spacious and modern studio recently erected by the company at Tucson, Arizona. The Eclair studios at Fort Lee, N. J., have been closed down temporarily, this move being necessitated by the fire which completely destroyed the laboratories of the company last March. Work on the new studio in the East is going forward rapidly, but until it is completed all the American-Eclair films appearing on the Universal program will be produced at the western plant in Tucson. The mechanical and production equipment of the latter studio is fully sufficient to take care of the large force of artists and mechanics.

SCENES IN WARNERS' FEATURES NEW YORK EXCHANGE.

By the Goat Man

I HAVE been in New York during six hours of daylight. It is a great old town in that it is different from all the others. In that it is like MOTOGRAPHY, which also differs from all the others. In New York the sidewalks are covered with coveys of actor folk out of a job and the rest of us take the streets to be sworn at by the chauffeurs. From Fortieth north as far as I've been Broadway is full of dolls and dollies telling each other about their coming engagements—measured always by weeks instead of dollars. In this great mass I found Agnes Egan Cobb hunting her meal ticket!

* * *

It is surprising what a lot of things one can do in six hours when they hurry. I saw Harry Reichenbach in his cozy office in the Longacre Theater building and sat on the piano stool while he told me that he was forever and ever, amen, through with m. p. conventions in the long grass country. Harry can't quite get over that portion of his "swindle-sheet" that he had to stand himself! He knows he is through with any convention that isn't easily accessible via a yellow taxi. He wants no more cabbage vendors to interfere with the thing he has in hand. Babe Farnham will understand what is meant, should Reichenbach have forgotten. For a perspiring morning it was inspiring to hear Harry tell all about the "Call of the North." This film will be shown to a select party at the Strand, August 9. After that you will understand more convincingly just what the Lasky folks are about.

* * *

It was a bad morning to see John Gray. Joe Brandt and G. Universal Stevenson were out somewhere and Gray was doing all the early Monday morning stunts single-handed. The boy brought back the message: "Just one minute." This isn't my first trip to New York. I know what a Monday morning minute registers on a Nicholas Power clock, so I beat it.

* * *

I saw Selznick on the street with the World's Film Corporation treasurer. Selznick was on his way to a kaffee-klatsch. He was taking no chances. I never knew he had breakfast so late, or lunch so early, but I found him just as interesting as ever. Some day I'll tell you all about Selznick—he isn't ready yet.

* * *

And it was only a moment to where Chester Beecroft has lodged so I saw him. We fixed it up between us to surprise Dave Horsley about Wednesday and find out if Dave knew when we'd have the first of those seven comedies a week.

* * *

Then it was nearly time to find some one to buy my lunch—or let me in on a pick-up and I blew right into Jim Kirk of Warner's. Mercy, what a lot there is to talk about when you find a regular ad. man. James B. Kirk has been at the game for years and years and I have been at it only during my entire lifetime. It is such a long story and such up-set stuff that I prefer to let Johnston tell it. This man Johnston is a charming fellow in many ways. He knows what constitutes film advertising—ask the man who knows. I like him because he actually thinks he leads. He takes the matter so terribly to heart; is so positive in his statements and so artistic in his qualifying remarks that I fancy he can make eighteen holes in about 148 if it is a nice quiet morning.

* * *

Advertising the films is a great little game. When I get to making 'em I'll put aside just so much money per reel. If the film flivvers, I'll say nothing and hang up the appropriated cash for the next reel. The advertising of a film subject should be charged into the production just the same as the big chandelier and the hand-carved mantel. If you don't make a big noise about a big film, it will take longer to get your money out of it. To hang up a big one in hot weather is straight folly. I agree with John-

Clara Kimball Young as Helen Marie in Vitagraph's "My Official Wife."

The toast in Vitagraph's "Uncle Bill."

ston on this subject for I sprung it first. Mike Kinney always added this to his brain creations: "Original thot out by Mike Kinney." I'll have to blow the Goat brand into the stuff I write. I would if I could take myself so all-fired seriously as some people I know!

* * *

I believe, when I return from Europe (should I ever get that far away from home), that I'll keep mum on what is and isn't to be. One by one they come floating back with a new line of dope. "The Feature Is Doomed" is a favorite headline. Pishtush! A feature film is the one that gets the coin—the one that holds 'em out. If the thing pictured is a mere two hundred feet in one of the topical weeklies and it is something we want to see—that's my notion of a feature.

* * *

When you can play to seventy thousand people on Broadway in dog days and with pictures, it emphasizes the necessity of using judgment in selecting your program. The longer I stick around the business—around the edge, all outside stuff—the more I realize that we've got a regular business ahead of us.

* * *

I smashed into one rumor after another today that something would blow before long—there were too many films; too many features. There will never be enough features, my hearties; never too many. When all films are features, the rumors will subside. There is a tremendous fortune in every feature. It is hardly possible that everybody can make 'em, but the ones who are to survive will come awfully close to making good ones all the while.

* * *

I got a little billet doo from Charlie VerHalen last week with some soft-pedal stuff about the next Reel Fellows meeting, incidentally asking me to come-on. I told Florence to tell Charlie that I was sorry, but to lay no plate for me. It was the second threat of the kind that Charlie has sent me, and I hope it will be the last. Feeling my shoulder blades, I'm sure there are no protruding pin feathers. No wings for mine as yet. I can get a special dispensation from the Missus when I want it, but I'm not crazy about this soft-pedal stuff the Reel Fellows are inclined to encourage. It is well enough to have fun but let us reach the point of membership first and let us establish that membership on a high plane. The Reel Fellows should encourage the imaginary a in the meaning.

* * *

There is enough to talk about in this business of real fellows. It isn't necessary to celebrate the birthdays of individuals. We can be good fellows without the imbibed priming.

* * *

Don Meaney has joined the Photoplay Productions Company and will take himself first to the lakes for a well-earned vacation and then to New York, where he will be eligible to membership in the Screen Club. Don will have full swing at the publicity desk where "The Littlest Rebel" was made famous. I wish him the fullest possible measure of success. We have always keen regret when New York reaches over into our back yard and grabs the live ones. There is some comfort in knowing that after a few years of this, the New York dopester will know what kind of work we are doing out west. We believe in making haste slowly.

From my short six hours of daylight in New York there is everywhere evidences of summer dullness—a self imposed condition due to the fellows who are seeing the film business as far away from Broadway as the Hudson river.

It is my purpose to hang-out in Gotham for several days. There is a lot of unfinished business respecting little Motog and its ambition to be of larger service to the industry. I'm going to buzz around the suburbs. I want to know whether Billy, the Bum Sailorman found Ad Kessel's horn the next morning after. I want to see Charlie Bauman's and Doc Willat's plant over at Fort Fee—they ought to be nearly ready to pull their show. I'm going over to see Parsons and up to New Rochelle to inspect the "Million Dollar Mystery" and Charlie Hite at close range.

* * *

It will be like crabbing my own stuff to tell my itinerary in advance and this writing to catch the "twentieth" is giving me eye-strain and making me muscle-bound, so I'll cut it right off here ahead of the regulation ten-em dash.

Activities of Lasky Company

Some idea of the extent to which the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company is going on gathering in stars and great plays can be gleaned from the roster of coming releases, announced by that concern recently. In the list are found "Ready Money" and "Bobby Burnitt" with Edward Abeles in the lead; Robert Edeson in "The Call of the North" and "Where the Trail Divides"; H. B. Warner and Rita Stanwood in their most recent stage success "The Ghost Breaker"; Max Figman and Lolita Robertson in "What's His Name?"; Dustin Farnum in "The Virginian," and Charles Richman in "The Rose in the Ring."

While the Lasky concern has a great number of additional stars under contract, they are withholding their names, but announce the following plays as future releases: Belasco's "The Girl of the Golden West," "Rose of the Rancho," "Sweet Kitty Bellairs," "Darling of the Gods," "Warrens of Virginia," "Return of Peter Grimm"; Liebler Company's "The Eternal City," "Merely Mary Ann," and "The Battle"; George Barr McCutcheon's fiction works, Harold MacGrath's latest novels, Stewart Edward White's Canadian stories and a great many of the more important works of George Broadhurst, Winchell Smith, and Edward Milton Royle. When the Lasky studios in the East are completed two companies will be kept busy continually.

Activities at Horsley Plant

The announcement made in last week's issue of David Horsley's plan to produce seven one-reel comedies a week to be released through twenty-nine special exchanges, was only a partial explanation of the secret and closely guarded activities of the Centaur studio at Bayonne, N. J., since the first of the year.

It now develops that a pretentious six-reel production of "Il Trovatore" has been diligently progressing, the scenario of which is founded upon the original antique drama "Leonora of Savilla," by Gatteres, and contains many new ideas in dramatic presentation. It was written by Charles Simone, under whose direction the picture is being made.

One of the most notable innovations will be the elaborate interior sets to be taken in the studio. It has long been one of David Horsley's ideas that more striking effects can be obtained from skillfully planned artificial sets than from remote "natural" scenes, which are inconvenient for entrances and exits.

With this end in view the Centaur studio and work shops have been busy since the first of the year building substantial castles, churches, convents battlements, etc., and constructing accurate properties and costumes of the period—the early 16th century.

This work has been in charge of J. E. Pinto, the Italian scenic artist and sculptor, who has devoted fully four months to the planning and construction of the elaborate sets, with the result that remarkable effects and illusions have been made possible.

In some of the scenes which really require exterior settings, notably the battle of Pelilla, as many as six hundred people and one hundred and eighty horses were used.

Among the players who appear in this production are Jean Thrall, Agnes Mapes, Morgia Litton, Georgette Leland, Julia Hurley, Carolyn French, Lorma Russell,

A scene from the six-reel production, "Il Trovatore."

Grace Renard, Charles Tricoli, Frank Holland, Fred Loomis, George Bancroft, M. E. Hannafy and others. Work on the picture is being rushed to completion, and it is expected to be ready for release on August 1.

Current Educational Releases

From Kandy to Colombo (Eclair).—A beautiful scenic in which we travel from Kandy by rail, through gorgeous forests and vegetations rich in color, over rice plantations, miles wide and through the most awe-inspiring gorges and ravines, until at last we arrive in the City of Colombo. The picture conveys the distant impression of a wonderful stereopticon view and the scenery is far beyond description.

Labor Demonstration in Hyde Park, London (Kalem).—That the I. W. W. is as active abroad as in America, is demonstrated by this absorbing feature which was photographed in London recently, where the members of the I. W. W. participated in a gigantic demonstration and parade.

Two other interesting topical views taken abroad show the launching of England's newest and most powerful dreadnaught, the "Marlborough," and coaching in Hyde Park.

Military Tattoo at Aldershot, England (Kalem).—In the Military Tattoo, held at Aldershot, England, is to be found one of the most impressive military spectacles in the world. Thousands of guardsmen, handsomely accoutered, take in this event.

The Mexican difficulty has brought our soldiers to the fore. Those people who have been fortunate enough to see our boys at drill will find it interesting to compare them with the "Tommy Atkinses" shown in this feature.

Cornailles — Brittany, France (Pathe).—Brittany, quaint and picturesque, holds forth many delightful spots for the curious traveler. Whether it be the old tower of Concarneau, the "Calvary" wayside shrine built in 1520, or the peculiar customs and fashions of the inhabitants of the province, one finds something strange and interesting at every turn.

The Tombs of the Ancient Japanese Emperors —Pathe. The tombs of the Emperors of Annan, carefully erected and ideally located, represent today the finest surviving specimens of the beautiful Japanese architecture of this ancient period.

The Hunting Spiders.—Pathe. (Prepared by Raymond L. Ditmars, Curator of Reptiles, New York Zoological Society). Among the spiders is shown the vicious tarantula, of South America, which kills small birds, reptiles and insects. It belongs to the group of hunting spiders that spin no web, but stalk their prey. Its lair is a tunnel of leaves bound by the creature's silk. The cocoon is nearly as large as a hen's egg and holds the spider's eggs. It is carefully guarded by the female in the shelter of rocks or heavy vegetation. It contains about 200 pearl-like eggs, which require six weeks for incubation. Frequently these poisonous spiders come north hidden in bunches of bananas. Rarely is a ship unloaded without the discovery of one or two tarantulas.

Another large tarantula inhabits Texas. It has shorter legs, a heavier body and shorter hair than the tropical species. Savage and alert, it neither courts nor avoids an attack. Another interesting spider shown is the mygales or trapdoor spider, of California, which dwells in the sterile regions. The doors of their burrows are covered and hinged with silk. The creature holds the door closed by hooking a claw in the silken lining.

The lycosa or wolf spider is common in the eastern part of the United States. It hides under stones in damp places and is an extremely alert and savage hunter. The cocoon of this spider is also shown. The female drags around the heavy cocoon and also carries the young for a full two weeks. The dolomedes or nursery spider is also shown. This is the interesting insect which is so often seen on bodies of fresh water. It gets its name from the "nursery" web spun over the cocoon to insure the safety of the young.

Cypress Logging in Florida.—Kalem. The logger's occupation has been the inspiration for innumerable tales of adventure. In this feature, showing cypress logging in the swamps of Florida, it is revealed as an occupation that demands a high degree of strength and skill of the men engaged in it. The operation of converting cypress, known as the "wood eternal," into lumber, commences six months before the tree is actually felled. "Timber lookers" locate the trees and girdle them in order that the sap dry, thus killing the trees. This is necessary so that the logs when sent down the river, may float. Succeeding scenes show how the trees are felled and sent to the mill. Here they are converted into shingles, laths, etc.

Vitagraph Bill Splendid

The best program the Vitagraph theater has shown comprises that of "My Official Wife," the six-part feature in which Clara Kimball Young, in the title role, is credited with doing her very best work so far, and then there's the three-part melodramatic farce, "Uncle Bill," which is responsible for constant mirth and interestedly meted out.

James Young deserves especial praise as the director of the interesting story of "My Official Wife," while Ralph Ince gets credit for the farce comedy, "Uncle Bill." No better program could be offered summer theater-goers.

An Excellent Pyramid

An American-made picture of the Pyramid brand will be released through Warner's Features on August 3. It is a three-reel drama, entitled "A Fight for Love," and contains many tense and appealing situations and a few exciting scenes.

The one thrill of the picture is the pursuit of the payroll thief, which is carried on for the greater part in automobiles, and concludes in a battle between the two rivals at the end of a rope hanging over a precipice.

Excellent photography shows to its best advantage the well-chosen settings and beautiful exteriors.

The Kleine Optical Company of Chicago has experienced a remarkable rush of orders during the past two weeks due to the sudden activity on the part of middle west churches in installing projection apparatus. From the records it would appear that a larger number of churches than ever before will show regular programs of motion pictures this fall.

DOG DAYS

NOW come the days when Sirius the Dog Star reigns. The white-hot sun sinks into the furnace and the evening breeze fails and lets the blistered earth cast forth the waves of humid heat it has absorbed. Men perspire and seek the cool open spaces and the cool open bottles. The moonlight twinkles on the water and the ice tinkles in the glass attractively. For once the clinical thermometer and the common variety agree to a degree. The front porch of the house and the back porch of the flat become living rooms—more comfortable for being disrobed of their walls.

The exhibitor sits in his deserted theater and figures the business he has lost—as though a man could lose what he never had. He mops his forehead and pulls at his dejected collar and anathematizes the weather. He has an expensive and very attractive program. But he is competing with a ruthless rival—the firm of Open Air and Cool Breezes, whose program is not expensive and whose admission price is nothing. So he loses.

To the man who lacks enterprise and horse sense the situation may well seem discouraging. For to such men any obstacle, any hitch in the humdrum routine of business, is discouraging. Of course, the really live exhibitor doesn't look at it that way. He is old enough and experienced enough to know that there is a hot spell every summer, and he can tell by his own feelings that in hot weather people hunt for the cool spots. This is so obvious that he hastens to provide a cool spot as a matter of course. He knows that the people will stand for a pretty poor show if the house is cool and that they will not stand for a first class show if the house is hot. In different words, the temperature is more important than the program.

Plenty of air circulating, which means a good system of fans, will keep the theater temperature several degrees lower than the street temperature. It doesn't take a very sensitive skin to discover that eighty degrees is cooler than ninety, nor an especially loose purse-hand to be willing to pay a few cents for the difference.

In the dog days a cool house with a poor show will take business away from a hot house with a good show. Of course, a hot house with a poor show might as well quit. But the cool house with the good show—there is where the money goes all summer, until competitors close up and the new business gained by comfort becomes permanent patronage.

LAW TO THE LETTER

NEW YORK, like most metropolitan centers, has a law against carrying firearms. As a consequence four photoplay cowboys were "pinched" in Van Cortlandt park the other day for packing guns. And the police magistrate told them they would have to get permits before they could be allowed to arm themselves. The law is the law and must be obeyed.

Now it behooves every producer of films to hand to the constituted authorities a list of his players with a request for so many dozen permits. For the gun we must have. It is the one indispensible property. Without it we could have no more dramas and few comedies. We should have to subsist on scenics and science. For, as every one knows, it is quite out of the question to produce a real photoplay without one or more guns.

It appears that the police are unduly officious in this matter. Every cowboy must pack a 45 whether he rides range in New Mexico, New Jersey or New York City. Lacking it, he would be but a poor tenderfoot.

But as for the plea in court that the guns of the four photoplayers were not loaded—that we cannot understand. The only guns we have ever seen in that condition in a picture were so because the "toter" had just unloaded them at some other photoplayer. Possibly the police waited until they had been unloaded before making the arrest.

At any rate we are sure that a photoplay without guns, or even with unloaded guns, would be like a film without celluloid.

CHICAGO KILLS AND CUTOUTS.

IT is of little profit to discuss here the doings of the Chicago police censor board with any hope of improving its methods thereby. We have already, on more than one occasion, remarked on the apparently arbitrary and unreasonable nature of the Chicago censors' decisions. Now we are presenting, on other pages of this issue, the record of the police censors in killed and cut pictures for the brief period of a half month. A study of this record bears out much of the accusation of arbitrariness; but it also shows that some of the cuts may have been justified. Perhaps a brief examination of specific cases will do the trade no harm.

Of course the very brevity of these orders, as they appear in type, is apt to give over-weight to their accusations. Reading the list, and with no other guide, it is easy to conceive that pictures of burglary and violent cruelty might be eliminated with justice. But there are listed many kills and cutouts with far less serious cause than that. Prize fighting and dueling are not practiced to any extent by the best families; but they are undeniably a part of life, and no one is particularly ashamed of them. The sub-title "Despair drives her to the pier" suggests no pleasant thoughts; but we cannot confine all our attention to the pleasant side of life. There may be a police objection to pictures of escapes from prison and the overpowering of law officers; but such things occur constantly, and we read about them in the papers. There is no concealing the fact that police are ordinary human beings, not invulnerable to attack. Even the small boy knows better than that. Beating a minister is quite shocking, it is true, but not properly more so than beating anyone else.

Perhaps the most striking of all the cutouts, however, is the one made July 9 on the Victor subject "Panama Exposition." The order reads: "Cut out two scenes showing statues of nude women"!

But it is useless to continue. This editorial will write itself in the minds of those who read the article, especially if they have seen enough of the films affected to realize the puerility of the censors' work. It is a simple matter so to describe a harmless picture that it appears, in the description, harmful and dangerous. It should be remembered that these subjects had all previously been passed by the National Board of Censorship—a guarantee in itself that the work in Chicago is uncalled for and unwarranted. Chicago taxpayers are supporting a department of official activity which is not only superfluous and illegitimate, but is fast making the city a laughing stock for hypocritical morality.

Gevaert Anti-Halo Negative

This new introduction of the Gevaert Company of Belgium will be of great value to all producers of motion pictures, as its use guarantees absolute freedom from all tendency to halation, even when it is necessary to take a scene in which the exposure is made directly against the light.

Gevaert anti-halo negative is based on an entirely new principle which prevents residues of the coloration or backing being left in the baths, as is the case with other anti-halo film. The desired qualities are obtained by a blue-tinted coating on the back of the film, which coating being impervious to all developing and fixing solutions, remains on the negative even after same has been developed, fixed and washed. The blue tint is actinic to a very high degree and does not interfere with the printing of the positive, excepting that it requires a trifle more time. Gevaert anti-halo negative will give superior results on all classes of work and the resulting positives made from same will have wonderful brilliancy and snap combined with a gradation impossible to obtain with ordinary film.

A majority of the large productions made in Europe during the past six months, including "Cabiria," have been taken on Gevaert anti-halo negative stock, and the wonderful effects secured in these masterpieces have been heretofore considered impossible. The use of anti-halo negative in combination with the new Gevaert colored base positive makes it possible to obtain almost any desired lighting or color combination as well as countless novel effects. The manipulation of Gevaert anti-halo negative is identical with that of ordinary kinds.

The sole American agent for the Gevaert products is the Raw Film Supply Company, 15 East 26th street, New York city, from whom full information, samples, etc., of this distinctive product may be secured.

"Atlantis" Popular in Middle West

President E. H. Brient of the Peerless Film Exchange, Chicago, reports that a large amount of business has been done with "Atlantis," the big six reel Great Northern picture which he has been circulating. The plot of the story is decidedly original in conception and treatment and the dramatic episodes so powerfully gripping that in many localities a return engagement was called for.

The sinking of the ship Roland is one of the most realistic portrayals of a sea tragedy ever shown upon the screen and with the high grade of acting for which the players of this company are noted it is little won-

"Brewster's Millions" Going Big

Edward Abeles, performing that inimitable comedy of "Brewster's Millions" on the screen at the Ziegfeld Picture Playhouse, Chicago, is now entering his third week in combination with Cecelia Loftus, who relates with new emphasis and drollery a chorus girl's experiences. This twain of stars have received a box office endorsement of patronage highly gratifying to the Ziegfeld management and their celluloid engagement is to be continued indefinitely.

"Quo Vadis?" George Kleine's first great picture which was scheduled to play a four-day engagement starting Monday of last week at the National Theater, Louisville, Ky., was continued through the entire week because of the splendid business done. The film is now fifteen months old and its present popularity shatters the accepted fallacy that the life of a screen subject is only six months.

Selig Stars Stage Sensational Story

Tale of Forests

ANOTHER one of Maibelle Heikes Justice's inimitable human interest stories has been done into pictures by the Selig Polyscope Company and will be released on August 3, under the title of "Etienne of the Glad Heart." It is a stirring tale of the primitive forests and abounds in hand to hand conflicts between the French Canadian trappers of the northland, and permits of the camera's recording some superb winter backgrounds for our enjoyment these hot summer days.

Olaf is made welcome in the home of Marie.

Such popular favorites as Bessie Eyton, Wheeler Oakman, Joe King, Tom Mix, Frank Clark and Lillian Hayward play the leading roles, and do so in a manner which leaves nothing to be desired. Mr. Oakman and Miss Eyton are the hero and heroine of the tale, but Tom Mix comes pretty near being a hero in the eyes of all who see him plunge into the icy waters of the little stream and wrestle for some time with Joe King, the "heavy" of the story. Snow and ice can be plainly seen on both banks of the stream, and there can be no question in anyone's mind but that it is a real winter scene. The water must have been icy cold, and yet Mix seems to thoroughly enjoy the tussle he has with King.

Both Clark and Miss Hayward are entitled to much praise for the skillful character work they do as Marie's father and mother. With less talented players in these important parts much that is good in Miss Justice's story would have failed to register, but the director knew what he was about when he chose his cast and the result is a harmony of action that is plainly revealed on the screen.

At the opening of the picture we learn that Etienne, a young woodsman, is in love with Marie, the daughter of old Paul, a sturdy trapper of the north. The young man has such a sunny disposition that he has become generally known as "Etienne of the glad heart," though, when occasion warrants, he can be stern and severe, too. Marie's aged parents have long looked forward to the marriage of their child with Etienne, and are expecting that following one more season in the lumber camps the woodsman will have enough money saved so that the wedding can take place.

One day a stranger arrives—one Olaf, a trapper. Marie's father encounters him upon the trail and brings him home, where he eventually becomes a boarder. Naturally he is attracted by Marie and, knowing nothing of her engagement to Etienne, he seeks to win her affections. One of Etienne's accomplishments, it seems, is playing the guitar, but when he brings it over to serenade Marie, Olaf borrows the instrument and proves to all that he is even a more accomplished musician than Etienne. Marie quite naturally shows more interest in him, and he believes that he has begun to win his way into her heart.

With the coming of winter Etienne and the other young men of the settlement start off for the logging camps. Gayly the young woodsman bids Marie farewell, for he is sure that when he returns they can celebrate their wedding. The girl waves him goodbye and turns to find Olaf staring at her. The handsome young trapper escorts her home, chattering gaily the while, and Marie decides that after all she is not going to be so dreadfully lonesome for Etienne.

During the winter Olaf makes considerable progress in his love making and time and again he and Marie are to be seen together. Marie's father strives to put a stop to Olaf's attentions, but his indignation reaches white heat when he chances upon Marie one day sewing upon some baby garments. Hearing that Etienne has returned from the lumber camp, accompanied by Peter, an Indian half breed, whom he had rescued from death, the agitated father insists upon both Etienne and Olaf coming to his home, and then demands of Marie that she name her betrayer. Marie is overwhelmed by shame and does not speak. Etienne, to whom the information is news, at once grasps the situation and springs upon Olaf to kill him with his bare hands. Marie's mother intervenes and saves Olaf's life, while the brokenhearted father orders the girl out of the house and drives Olaf after her.

The once happy home of the old trapper becomes a place of sorrow. The grim old father forbids anyone to even speak the name of Marie within his hearing, but the sad-faced mother grieves and grieves over her absent daughter, while Etienne loses all his spirit and boyishness and grows more and more gloomy as time passes.

Discovering how deeply Etienne has taken Marie's disgrace to heart, the mother visits his cabin by stealth and urges him to undertake a search for the girl—to at least learn whether she is happy and contented with the man who has betrayed her. After consulting with Peter, his Indian friend, Etienne starts out on the search. After days of traveling they discover the cabin in which the girl and Olaf have taken up their residence, and learn that Marie is heartbroken over the harsh and brutal treatment she has received at the hands of Olaf.

Waiting their opportunity, watching the cabin stealthily until they see Olaf start off to inspect his traps, Etienne and Peter manage at last to reach Marie alone and to offer to restore her to her parents. Marie happily consents to return and they three hasten away and embark in Etienne's canoe. Meanwhile Olaf returns in search of matches which he had forgotten when starting away, and notes with surprise the absence of Marie. His skill in woodcraft quickly leads to a discovery of what has happened, and grasping his rifle he starts in pursuit of the little party which has so shortly preceded him.

A chase which is highly thrilling results, and Olaf creeps closer and closer to the heavily laden canoe of Etienne. He sights the man whom he has grown to hate, and taking deliberate aim at the fleeing trio he empties his rifle at them. Luckily they escape without being hit, but knowing that Olaf will overtake them, decide to make their last stand ashore. Accordingly the canoe is beached and they wait Olaf's arrival. As the trapper drifts past, undecided as to just what to do, Peter, realizing what Etienne's friendship means to him, and knowing how despicable has been the conduct of Olaf, suddenly leaps into the canoe, sends it whirling up beside the craft of Olaf and then, leaping like a hungry tiger upon the shoulders of the trapper, upsets both canoes and, still fighting, both men are plunged into the icy waters of the stream. A few moments later Peter, alone, rejoins Etienne and Marie, who have watched the thrilling fight from the bank.

Joyful indeed is the homecoming of Marie. Both her father and mother clasp her in their arms and seek to comfort her. Etienne once more brings round his guitar and seating himself on the rude table proceeds to sing the old love songs of the north. The girl smiles happily for the first time in months, and as Etienne discards the guitar and holds out his arms to her, Marie once more steals into his embrace, while Peter, believing that "two's company, three's a crowd," slips quietly out of the cabin.

The cast is as follows:

Etienne	Wheeler Oakman
Marie	Bessie Eyton
Olaf	Joe King
Peter	Tom Mix
Old Paul	Frank Clark
Ritta, his wife	Lillian Hayward

Ad-Film Makers to Organize

With the view to bettering trade conditions and eliminating the irresponsibles who are entering the industrial motion picture field, a call for a meeting of industrial advertising film manufacturers to take up these matters has been issued by H. J. Elkin, manager of the industrial department of Pathe Freres, Arthur N. Smallwood of the Smallwood Film Corporation, and J. M. Torr, editor of Moving Picture Publicity. They ask the attendance of all manufacturers of industrial films at a meeting to be held August 15 at Hotel Shelbourne, Brighton Beach, New York.

One of the most important topics to be considered will be the formation of a National Association of Ad-Film Manufacturers and the attendance of all those interested in such a movement is urgently requested. Replies should be sent to Arthur N. Smallwood, 175 Fifth avenue, New York.

Key to Fortune Concealed in Ring

Beautiful Spanish Setting

BEAUTIFUL exterior backgrounds, which portray with wonderful vividness all the rugged beauty of the Spanish sea coast, form a splendid setting for "The Secret of the Ring," a three-part drama by the Cines Company, which is to be presented by George Kleine through the General Film Company, on August 10.

The tale is one of struggle and from the moment the first scene is flashed upon the screen until the conclusion there is a constant series of setbacks, many of which come at the most inopportune times and which are certain to keep the interest of the picture audiences up to the highest pitch. Several novel effects are introduced during the course of the story and the plot is firmly knit together, so that all the incidents follow in their natural order and appear plausible at all times.

The acting is life-like and the players do some wonderful team work in several scenes which require exacting expressions. The character of Ralph, the millionaire, who is wrongfully imprisoned through a sea captain's mistake, is well handled by the actor who assumes the part and all those in the supporting cast add to the attractiveness of the picture by their splendid character portrayals.

In direct contrast to the wonderful exterior scenery several views of the interior of a broken down inn are shown, the realism of which is worthy of note. The scenes taken about the millionaire's estate and showing the many flower beds and walks through the garden are cleverly photographed.

The story opens with the departure of Ralph Redwood for London to claim the fortune his late uncle has left him. The uncle was an eccentric man and had hidden all his fortune in an old residence which contained many secret passages. The only way to locate it was by means of a ring which contained a chart of the building hidden under one of its stones.

Having secured the ring and all the papers which would serve to identify him, Ralph telegraphs his uncle's lawyers that he will soon reach London. Jasper Rowles, a convict who has just been released from prison, hears of Ralph's good fortune and sees him send the telegram. Not having money enough to pay his passage on the boat, Jasper takes a desperate chance and climbs aboard by using the anchor chain as a ladder.

He sees Ralph alone on the deck and knocks him unconscious. He then takes the millionaire's coat containing the valuable papers and the ring and throws his victim overboard. While the sailors rush to the drowning man and rescue him Jasper goes to Ralph's stateroom and dons his clothes, assuming the name of the man he has robbed.

A wireless reaches the boat, saying that Jasper Rowles has boarded his boat and telling the captain to capture him if possible. As Ralph is semi-conscious and can tell the captain nothing about himself, the sea-tyrant believes him to be the crook and has him locked up in a stateroom. Meanwhile Jasper associates with the best of the ship's passengers under the name of Ralph Redwood and meets a young lady with whom he falls in love.

Jasper discovers the hidden treasure.

To seal their friendship he gives her the ring he took from Ralph, and another passenger takes their picture, the ring showing very prominently. The boat arrives at the dock and Ralph is handed over to the police while the criminal proceeds to the millionaire's newly acquired estate. The next day he visits the lawyer with whom Ralph's uncle had placed the papers necessary to the securing of the estate, and is amazed when he learns that he will have to show the ring as a means of identification.

He hurries to the home of his sweetheart, only to find that as she was about to enter a jewelry store that day her bag containing the ring had been snatched from her by a thief. Jasper is greatly worried but the young lady suggests that they have a duplicate of the ring made by a jeweler from the picture they had taken on the boat.

This is done and the lawyer accepts the proof as substantial, but tells him that he will have to seek the fortune himself from the chart he will find under the stone of the ring. Again the crook sees himself beaten, but he determines to advertise for the original ring, with the hope of locating it.

Meanwhile Ralph has been serving a sentence for the other man's misdeeds, but he reaches the end of his endurance. Taking advantage of the guard's momentary drowsiness, he plunges into the river near the prison and swims to the other side. He seeks shelter in the home of a girl named Rosa, who lives with her brother. These good people listen to his story and gladly agree to help him.

The band of thieves decide to return the ring when they see the ad in the paper and one of them goes to Jasper and tells him he must come to their rendezvous if he wishes to secure it. Rosa's brother lends Ralph a suit of clothes, and when he finds the ad in the paper he determines to go to the imposter and trap him. He follows the young lady whom he saw Jasper with on the boat and who is now the crook's wife, and arrives at the estate which is rightly his just as the leader of the crooks, who had hoped to double-cross his pals and get all the reward himself arrives with the ring. Ralph sees him show the ring to the maid and brag about the money he is to receive for it.

Not finding Jasper at home, the crook starts to leave, but Ralph follows and in the struggle that takes place the millionaire secures the ring. He hurries back to Rosa and her brother and together they discover the chart and plan to get the fortune at once from its mysterious hiding place.

The crook hurries back to his comrades and Jasper is brought in by another of the band. All learn of the stolen ring and the leader, who has learned where Ralph is staying, proposes that they go to the house to get it. All go to Rosa's home and being unable to find the ring, kidnap the girl, leaving a note saying that when the ring is delivered to them they will release her. At the time she fell into their hands Rosa had the chart telling the location of the hidden treasure in her hand, and Jasper finds this when they bring her to the inn. He says nothing to the other crooks but takes the paper from her and seeks the treasure, finding it with but little difficulty. However, in his greed at the sight of the money he crawls into the safe in which it is kept and the door slams after him.

Rosa's brother and Ralph go to the inn, and after a struggle with the crooks, rescue the girl. They then follow the secret route they learned from the chart and find Jasper locked in the vault. He is placed under arrest and Ralph at last secures the wealth that is rightfully his. As Rosa and him have been in love from the moment they met she gladly accepts when he asks her to share his fortune with him and her brother promises he will make his home with them.

Just A Moment Please

Only one more week till vacation.

Some of these hot days when we begin to suspect that we're working too hard we have only to pause and ponder over the fact that "Tecla," the sunbeam of the Essanay publicity office, is losing weight herself. Have a care, woman, or you'll become thin!

THEM CRUEL-HEARTED CENSORS.

Omer Doud is responsible for the report that when one of the eagle-eyed censors was recently viewing a print of "Anne Boleyn" in the Kleine projection room he was so overcome by the farewell scene between Anne and her waiting maid that he ordered the film stopped immediately and the entire scene eliminated, giving as his reason, "It's too pathetic!"

Gee, this Harry Campbell, chief operator at the Selig projection room, is becoming temperamental! Dropped in there accidentally the other day and discovered they've had to install a talking picture device to satisfy Harry. Nothing will do but that he shall have music with his "pics." And such records as he plays—cornet solos and worse—oh, much worse! But then, we all have our peculiarities, so if Harry's is music we suppose he's entitled to enjoy it, no matter what happens.

OUR BURG.

Our w. k. cit., W. N. Selig, is riding the bounding billows as we go to press. The Col. sailed from Noo Yawk for Europe on the Imperator, July 18. Bon Voyage, Col.

Geo. Kleine, another of our prom. cits., boarded the rattler for the Effete East one day last wk. Reckon he's about ready with another big show.

The esteemed (so to speak) Maj. Funkhouser has been basking in the limelight lately, on account of a certain shooting affair on Our Burg's South Side. It ain't pitchers this time though that got him "in Dutch" with the village constabulary, so "we should bibble." For once, we're for you, Maj.

Charles "Feature" Abrams held a auction in Our Burg one day last wk.

"Titch," a w. k. Easterner, put up at the La Salle House on Main St., and hobnobbed with friends for several days last wk.

A certain young man about town celebrated his birthday on the 17th in a sensational manner. Ah, there, Walter!

Gee, them poor Edison actors! What troubles they do have. A Noo Yawk contemp chronicles the fact that a bunch of Edison movie cowboys was "pinched" for carrying shooting irons in Van Cortlandt Park, this being in violation of the Sullivan law (whatever that is). Now, with a few more reforms this pitcher business will become almost genteel.

We haven't had time to read any of the articles referred to above, but we'll wager a big brown cookie that it's only another attacks of the "ticks."

ELEANOR BLANCHARD, with twelve years' experience upon the legitimate stage and five years in the motion picture studios, is certainly qualified to be one of the most useful character actresses of the Lubin plant.

Eleanor Blanchard.

Miss Blanchard is not only an American but per extreme a quaker, born in Philadelphia. She does not state when—says it is none of our business. However, vital statistics are not as important as earnest endeavor and ability. She is a student and a writer of stories and photoplays. Her preference in roles is comedy especially of the Dickens type. Her political views are "Leave it to the men, it is not a woman's work." She is an actress and that is enough employment for any normal mind. Miss Blanchard is in the company directed by Col. Joe Smiely and has the opportunity of appearing in many of the Lubin feature pictures. She has become a great favorite with the "fans."

LOUISE HUFF is called the "Kate Greenaway Girl of the screen" because of her likeness to the creations of the English artist of the last generation. But she autographs her picture with her real name, and under the name she writes "Lubin." When she skips into a picture she brings with her a pair of violet eyes, a mass of soft blonde curls and a delicate oval of a face. Yet more than this she is five feet of tender, wistful charm and quaintness. She says she's just an old-fashioned girl who likes to stay at home, when she can, and sew and play an old-fashioned mahogany piano which used to grace the drawing room of her old home in Georgia. To think of such a quaint little creature going through the antics of the modern dances would seem almost profane, but the Kate Greenaway Girl loves quadrilles, with an occasional waltz for excitement. She slyly admits she also likes the tango.

Louise Huff.

JOSEPH KAUFMAN came to the Lubin studio after many years of stock and road experience equipped with a thorough knowledge of the many technicalities of his art and has been working regularly in pictures since that time with great success. He is of a cheerful disposition and always has a kind word for all those associated with him, which has made him exceedingly popular with all his fellow-players in the Philadelphia studios. That he has a bright future in store for him appears a certainty, for he has taken naturally to the screen and has proven himself fitted to portray the difficult characters in which he has been assigned. This natural adaptness to the silent drama does not come easily to all recruits from the stage. His home is in Washington, D. C., where he was born in 1882. He attended and graduated from Georgetown University.

Joseph Kaufman.

CAROL HALLOWAY is one of the prettiest girls in all the realm of photoplay and is conspicuous because she is a capital little actress as well, so she adds something more than beauty to Lubin films. She started as a choir singer, but met with many bitter disappointments. Then a friend suggested the stage, and from the moment Carol Halloway stepped behind the footlights on the stage of the Casino in New York in the chorus of "The Balkan Princess," her fortunes changed, and within three weeks she had been given one of the principal parts to play. Then followed a summer season with Gilbert & Sullivan opera and a role as the gypsy princess in "The Lady of the Slipper." After this she played in the dramatic production "Everywoman," and from there joined the Lubin Company where she has remained ever since.

Carol Halloway.

Fantomas Again Eludes Law

The fifth release of the Gaumont "Fantomas" series of detective dramas is a startling one in four parts, entitled "The False Magistrate." As in the other installments of this series, Fantomas outwits the police authorities at every turn and in the end, after a number of thrilling experiences with both police and criminals, is still at large with a larger list of crimes than ever for which he will have to atone.

Several parts of the picture are especially meritorious. Fantomas' disguise as the magistrate seems to not only change his facial appearance but his whole bearing and manner. In the movements, attitude and dignity of the aged man there lingers no trace of the active young criminal. Another unusual part of the picture is where the real magistrate is thrown out of a swiftly moving train passing over a high bridge into the river below.

Several of the complications denote a carefully and cleverly plotted scenario. Chief of these are the way in which Fantomas causes a man's death by asphyxiation and the way he forces the warden to release him after his identity has been discovered.

Splendid exteriors, substantial, well-arranged interiors and clear photography are in evidence throughout the picture.

At the close of the last release Fantomas is in prison in Belgium serving a life sentence for murder. Several crimes committed in France suggest Fantomas' methods, and Inspector Juve thinks to capture the whole band by securing the clever crook's release and keeping a watch on him until his movements betray the identity of the other criminals.

Through careful arrangement Fantomas is allowed to escape from the Belgium prison and Juve takes his place. On board a train bound for France the villain discovers that he is being shadowed by detectives. To elude them he jumps from his car into a baggage coach on the next track. It happens that a newly appointed magistrate on his way to assume his new duties nearly misses his train, barely catching the baggage coach, which is the last car.

Fantomas, who is hiding in the same car, attacks the magistrate, overcomes him, takes his papers of authority and recognition, and, disguising himself as the magistrate, continues the journey.

The new magistrate is welcomed at the court and instructed by his predecessor in his new duties and the current matters of the court. Because of his official position Fantomas is accepted into exclusive society, several members of which he manages to blackmail for large sums. He also secures the release of several desperate criminals brought before him for trial.

Suspicious of some trick, Juve hesitates about handcuffing Fantomas.

The journalist, Fandor, meets the new magistrate and suspects his identity. After much trouble he is able to get Fantomas committed to prison, the final evidence being given by Juve, who has been extradited from the Belgium prison to testify. The officials think that this time they surely have Fantomas, but they should have taken others into their confidence.

When Fantomas realizes that he can not escape arrest his last official act is to send a message to the warden giving him personal permission to release the prisoner arrested as Fantomas, as it is none other than Juve in disguise. The arrest, Fantomas explains, is a part of a prearranged plan to help in a case on which he is working. The ruse is successful and Fantomas is once more at large.

"Cabiria" Leased for Record Price

At what is said to be the highest price ever paid for limited territory on a pure rental basis, exhibition rights to Cabiria, the Itala Film's masterpiece, have been sold by Harry R. Raver to Frank Rogers of Knoxville, Tenn., for fourteen southern states. The price is in excess of $50,000. Rogers may exploit a single copy of Cabiria in the states he controls during the life of the contract, which runs for fifty weeks.

Clauses in the contract provide for the exploitation and presentation of this wonderful picture in a manner consistent with its dignity. This deal is most important because of the sum involved and because it opens up a comparatively unexplored method of marketing a film of sufficient merit to constitute an evening's entertainment in itself.

Mary Fuller Company at Work

Miss Mary Fuller, accompanied by Walter Edwin and Charles Ogle, her former Edison associates, and an especially selected supporting company, left New York for Shohola, Pike county, Pa., July 17, where she will take the lead in her first picture to be released on the Universal program, entitled "The Heart of the Night Wind." Several other pictures will also be made on the trip, which will last about two months.

Guardian Plans to Drive Girl Insane

Detective Foils Plot

SPLENDID photography, tastily arranged stage settings and a real story of mystery make Essanay's "The Seventh Prelude," adapted from a story in the Munsey Magazines by Lillian Bennet-Thompson, a real feature offering. Friday, July 31, is to be the release date of this multiple reel subject.

Richard Travers as Jack Gordon, a deductive detective, has an excellent opportunity to show what he can do with a Sherlock Holmes type of character, and he undoubtedly gives us one of the most interesting detective creations of the screen. His "Jack Gordon" is a role that will long be remembered and this reviewer looks eagerly forward to seeing Gordon solve some other mysteries in the future. Bryant Washburn, as Carr Hall, is a sort of "Dr. Watson" to Gordon, and fits in nicely as a companion to the detective hero of the drama.

Gordon shinned up the tree.

To Thomas Commerford falls the exceedingly difficult role of Mr. Warren, Alice's father, and never has this grand old player of character roles been seen to better advantage than in this part. His death scene is a masterpiece of pantomime, worthy of the real artist that Mr. Commerford is. Gerda Holmes makes a most interesting person of Alice Warren, and one instantly sympathizes with her, and is curious to see the delusion with which she is afflicted dissipated.

Rapley Holmes has a heavy role for a change, being James Cummings, Alice's uncle and the real "villyun" of the piece. William Robinson, who has hitherto been seen in the Essanay comedy company, plays a character role in "The Seventh Prelude" and does it most acceptably. He appears as Dr. Hamilton Hale, a noted psychologist.

As the story opens we see Jack Gordon, detective, with his friend Carr Hall much interested in the mysterious murder of a Mr. Warren, which has baffled the police. Warren, a wealthy widower, whose hobby is music, is shot to death in his home one night while playing Chopin's "Seventh Prelude." Only two people are in the house at the time—Alice Warren, his pretty daughter, and James Cummings, her uncle. Following the funeral the will is opened and it becomes known that Cummings is named as executor of the Warren fortune and guardian of Alice, as she is under age. To this arrangement Alice enters a decided objection, and Cummings can do nothing.

Meanwhile the girl develops a strange hallucination. She imagines that each night, at 10 o'clock, the hour when her father was murdered, she hears the "Seventh Prelude" again being played in her home and declares herself positive that it is her father calling to her. Cummings consults Dr. Hale, a noted psychologist, and that gentleman arranges to begin treating her for the strange mental malady.

It is at this point that Gordon becomes interested in the case and, learning that Alice is being treated by Dr. Hale, he goes to the famous specialist and learns from him much of interest regarding the daughter of the murdered man. Hale gives Gordon the impression that Alice is mildly insane but the deductive detective arrives at the conclusion that she is being driven to insanity by her uncle, and that in some manner he is really causing her to hear the "Seventh Prelude" at the same hour each night, shrewdly planning to have her declared insane, thus overruling her objections to him as a guardian in court and gaining access to the fortune left her by her father.

Gordon is able to persuade Hale to permit him to be present, though concealed, when Alice comes for another treatment and has all his conclusions strengthened a thousandfold after overhearing the girl's conversation with Hale.

Gordon is permitted to overhear Alice's consultation with Hale.

A day later he visits Alice in her home and has her describe in detail the events of the tragic night on which her father met his death. The point that the playing of the "Seventh Prelude" starts at exactly the same time on each night impresses itself strongly on Gordon's mind and he determines to be present that night at the appointed hour to try out a theory which he has already formed.

Gordon cautions Alice about telling Cummings anything of his interest in the case and then makes other necessary arrangements for the forthcoming test of his deductions.

That night Gordon and his friend Hall arrive at the Warren home and are taken by the girl to her boudoir, from which point she usually hears the strange music each night. Hall is left to converse with Miss Warren and instructed to lower the shade of the window the moment that the first strains of the "Seventh Prelude" are to be heard. Gordon descends to the lower part of the house and satisfies himself that the rooms are deserted and the music room, in particular, empty.

As ten o'clock draws nigh Gordon steps outdoors, gives a signal previously agreed upon, and a few seconds later is joined by two policemen, whom he instructs to enter the house and arrest Cummings when he gives the word. The detective, himself, shins up a tree which stands near the house and from whose upper branches he is able to peer into the room occupied by Cummings.

Alice's uncle is puttering about his room, stopping occasionally to glance at his watch. When Gordon sees him suddenly disappear within a closet he looks at his own watch and notes that it is nearly time for the ghostly music to begin. Glancing up at the window where Hall is stationed he is delighted to suddenly note the lowering of the shade, and a minute later swings down from a limb of the tree which permits him to get his feet on the ledge of Cummings' room. He can now clearly hear the strains of the "Seventh Prelude" floating out on the air. Without a moment's hesitation he kicks in the window and plunges into the room.

Just as he enters in this sensational manner the music stops and he beholds Cummings emerging from the closet. The uncle of Alice instantly leaps toward the intruder in his room, but Gordon manages to get the best of the wrestling match and by the time Alice, Hall and the two policemen enter he has his man flat on his back on the floor. The policemen snap the handcuffs on the prostrate man, much to the surprise of Alice, who is inclined to spare her uncle such treatment, but Gordon waves her aside, plunges into the closet and a moment later emerges with a phonograph in his hands. On the machine he shows those assembled in the room a record of Chopin's "Seventh Prelude" which Cummings had nightly played to Alice in the room next door.

The crafty uncle had played the record over night after night, and then, when Alice mentioned the music, had emphatically declared that he heard nothing himself, his plan being to gradually force her into insanity. The clever deductions of Gordon had upset all his plans however and he is finally led away by the policemen, while Alice joins in thanking Gordon and Hall for saving her from the fate which her uncle has so skilfully planned for her.

Busy Trio Snapped by Camera

"the men behind" the production of "Eagle's Nest," which is now being filmed.

Reading from left to right are Andy Adams, Romaine Fielding and Edward Arden. The first of the trio named is a man who has followed the growth of the west closely, having always made that country his home. His seven books on the American plains and cowboys have given the world a true insight into the conditions existing in that region.

Mr. Fielding, who acts as producing manager for the Colorado plant of the Lubin Company, as well as directing and acting in all his own pictures and writing many of them, is seen looking over the manuscript of the play, and Mr. Arden at his side is the author.

The two latter men will have prominent roles in the production, while Mr. Adams will merely furnish local color, as, according to himself, he "can impersonate no character save his own."

Conspirators Plans Again Foiled

Florence Still Safe

EPISODES number five and six of Thanhouser's "Million Dollar Mystery" show the continued but fruitless efforts of the plotting conspirators and incidentally dispose of the box which is supposed to contain the fortune, by dropping it into the sea.

Most of the exterior scenes in the fifth episode are tinted to represent "night," but despite this fact the photography is clear and the scenes taken on the water are notable for their evenness. The high grade of acting which was established in the first picture of the series is maintained by all the principals and the beauty of the interior sets and the exterior locations, is fully worthy of the general high plane which the story has maintained thus far.

To those who are watching eagerly for clues these two episodes will be of no little interest, as on several occasions a crisis appears to have been reached. The work of Sidney Bracer as Jones, the family butler, continues to be the main pivot upon which the plot revolves, although the conspirators take things into their own hands in the sixth episode, and a large part of the two reels are spent in the attempt to secure Florence from their clutches, after they have locked her in a room.

Episode five, entitled "At the Bottom of the Sea," opens with a meeting of Countess Olga and two of her confederates and their determination to get some clue of the missing money. To this end they insert an ad in the paper stating that the hiding place has been discovered and that the fortune must be removed at once. To this they sign Hargreaves' initials. Florence reads the ad while Olga is visiting her and the countess advises her to make the change. Jones, however, is doubtful, but is glad the countess has learned of the intention to change the money, as he is growing to suspect her, and when she returns to the apartments she instructs her co-plotters to keep an eye on him, as the feeling of mistrust is mutual between them.

Jones takes matter upon his own shoulders and creeps to an upstairs room, where he removes a box from the wall bearing the initials "S. H." One of the "Black Hundred," disguised as an organ grinder, sees him remove the box and at once reports to Braine, the leader of the band, and the two follow the butler to the docks.

The faithful servant gets into a motor boat and, seeing that he is followed, urges the operator of the craft to great speed. The plotters secure another boat and follow closely behind. Jones stops on an island and hurries toward the center of the stretch of land to hide the box, but just as he is about to dig a hole in which to conceal it he sees that the other boat is within sight of the island and hurries back to his own craft and the two boats then engage in a desperate race.

Jones sees that he is slowly being overtaken and throws the box into the sea, at the same time shooting at a vital part of the machinery of the conspirator's boat and disabling it. He then has his craft rushed to shore and the others are forced to plunge into the water to save their lives when their boat catches fire and explodes.

Jones returns in time to serve the supper and proceeds about his work as though nothing had happened.

another conspirator planning the capture of Florence, so they may force her into telling them where the fortune is located and if it were really the box containing the money that the butler threw overboard. All details of their latest plan are carefully thought out and one of the band is dressed as a count, a disguise he so cleverly makes use of that even the countess is puzzled as to his identity.

Florence is invited to the affair by the countess and Jones overhears the woman he considers one of their enemies ask Florence to attend the event, and suspects it is a plot against the girl. He at once telephones Norton and together they hurry toward the place which has been selected as the destination of the party.

They arrive and find a historical old house, and Norton meets an old woman servant employed there who was formerly his nurse. Never thinking it will be of use to them, she leads them through a secret passage into a room called the "Egyptian apartment," and then through the various parts of the big mansion.

The fake count shows great interest in Florence, as per his schedule, and she goes with him to the house on a sightseeing trip. He leads her to the "Egyptian apartment" and points out the many beautiful objects, and while her attention is held by them he slips out and locks her inside. She discovers that she has been tricked and at first considers it a joke, but the moment she finds all means of escape have been shut off she becomes terrified.

Norton has been watching closely and when he hears two of the conspirators talking of Florence's capture he rushes through the secret passage and rescues her. They make their way through the passage back to the lawn, where Jones awaits them with horses and all mount and ride away. The conspirators come to try to force Florence into giving them the desired information but find that she has gone and, rushing from the building, see the trio riding down the road.

They jump into an auto and pursue them. The riders see that they are being overtaken and Jones stays behind and hides in the bushes, ripping the tires of the auto as it pauses a moment before him in its mad flight. Then he springs to his horse again and follows Norton and Florence down the road, leaving the Princess Olga and her conspirators in their machine raging like wild people and making empty threats of what they intend to do to the figures of the three who are fast disappearing over the hill in the distance.

Alco Film Company's Radical Plan

Al Lichtman, until recently sales manager of the Famous Players Film Company, and who during the period prior to his resignation from that concern was responsible for the merchandising methods and innovations in the distribution of feature films, has formed the Alco Film Company and established offices in the Heidelberg building, Times Square, New York City, for the distribution of quality films.

The plan of the Alco Film Company, of which Mr. Lichtman is president and general manager, is a novel one, as under the arrangement he has worked out a quality film subject is bound to receive the recognition and financial returns which are its due.

The plan which Mr. Lichtman intends to inaugurate is to organize a circuit of the largest picture theaters throughout the country, one in each of the largest cities of the United States. These theaters will book one meritorious feature film a week, obtained from any reputable source, through the Alco Film Company, for which the theater will pay the highest justified and possible price, in return for which the Alco Film Company will give these respective theaters throughout the country exclusive privileges in their cities for a certain period. This policy will enable the theater to charge a higher price of admission than has heretofore been within the range of the exhibitor, and without fear that after pursuing a complete advertising campaign for the picture, a competing exhibitor can obtain the same film within a short time thereafter and reap the profits of the other's enterprise. To effect this security, after the week's run the film will not be shown in the city for a term of six months, during which time the film will play the smaller towns throughout the country, distributed from the Alco exchanges, which will be established at an early date in the principal cities of the United States.

The Vitagraph Theater has scored another success in the masterful five-part drama, by Richard Henry Savage, "My Official Wife," now in its second week.

Grace McHugh Drowned

FEW PICTURES have such wonderful background for their action as has "Across the Border," a three-reel drama produced by the Colorado Motion Picture Corporation and released through Warner's Features. The plot of the story is laid near the Rio Grande, and, although that border line is substituted by the Arkansas River, the sandy knolls, vegetation and arid stretches of land give the desired atmosphere and carry one along with the story.

The rendezvous of the ammunition smugglers.

The picture is full of action and is interesting from the start. In the first reel, after an exciting chase between some ammunition smugglers and a ranger, which ends by the ranger and his horse taking a terrifying fall down the side of a hill, romance is introduced into the picture and plays a prominent part till its finish.

The principal parts were taken by Grace McHugh as Anita, the outlaw's daughter; Edmond Cobb as Curly Smith, the ranger; Ted Hardcastle as Dean, the outlaw's lieutenant, and Arthur S. Lewis as Amador, the outlaw chief. It was in the taking of this picture that the heroine, Grace McHugh, and the cameraman were drowned.

Curly Smith, lieutenant of the rangers patrolling the border, becomes suspicious of the true contents of a wagon-load of hay he sees being taken across into Mexico and follows the shipment to its destination. From a distance he watches the unloading and, as he thought, the hay is only a subterfuge to cover the smuggled ammunition and guns which the wagon contains. In attempting to return to headquarters Curly is discovered and chased. He is thrown from his horse and afterwards found by Anita, the outlaw chief's daughter, who takes him home, bandages his sprained ankle and does all possible for his comfort. The smugglers find him in Amador's shack, recognize him and plan to get rid of him.

Curly and Anita fall in love, and Anita helps him in his attempt to escape, but he is recaptured. The outlaws think to torture Curly by binding him just out of reach of a large rattlesnake which at any moment may work itself loose and attack him. Again Anita comes to his aid and releases him. The real cause for Curly's persecution is the jealousy of one of the outlaws, Dean, who is in love with Anita, though he gets no encouragement from her.

Anita learns of Dean's plans to steal Curly away from the Amador home and shoot him. She rides across the border and informs the commander of the regiment encamped there of Curly's peril. As Curly stands blindfolded, about to be fired upon, the soldiers arrive and in the excitement the prisoner is forgotten by all except Anita, who hurries to loosen his bonds. Dean eludes the pursuing soldiers and returns to carry out the execution, but is killed by Curly.

The soldiers give up the chase and Curly and Anita return with them across the border, where, it is not hard to guess, Anita is to become Mrs. Smith.

Old Glory in Ireland

If you were touring Europe and had been held up all along the route by cheerful little robbers who wanted "tips," wouldn't you welcome the sight of Old Glory swinging to the breeze in the beautiful wilds of Ireland? Sure, you would! Then, of course, you are not surprised to hear from "Wid" Gunning, who is over with Sid Olcott, the producer of international features, that they have simply been overwhelmed with the swarms of American tourists who have seen the Stars and Stripes flying in the breeze and have promptly climbed down from their jaunting cars to give three cheers and then come over to talk for a time with the group of energetic Americans working there in the shadow of the famous

Actress Risks Life

Cleo Madison, who is being featured in the "Trey o' Hearts" series (Universal), underwent the crowning sensational incident in her life recently during the filming of "White Water," the second installment of the series.

For the purpose of injecting realism into the picture and that the specified business of the story might be carried out to the letter, she allowed herself to be carried a half mile through the death-dealing rapids of the San Gabriel river. It was a task which would cause a strong man and a good swimmer to flinch, but Miss Madison does not know the name of fear, and it is not a question what her director, Wilfred Lucas, can prevail upon her to do, but what he can prevail upon her not to do.

The waters of the San Gabriel river are icy cold. The channel of the river not only runs down a steep incline but the bed of the river is strewn with large boulders. Although Miss Madison is not an expert swimmer, she plunged into the cold water and piloted herself through the dangerous rapids without mishap. The result was one of the most convincing pieces of realism ever filmed.

His Legs Aren't Really This Long

The owner of the legs in the accompanying photograph is Edward Earl who disports with dignity in many leading roles on the Edison program. Fortunately for Mr. Earl, however the legs are not as long as the picture suggests though Edward is of the popular height supposed to best become evening clothes. Furthermore, the picture is his own drawn by him and he does not object to your knowing that the face which presents itself in his pipe-dreams is that of Mrs. Edward Earl, who in a number of instances has also worked before the camera. Earl is a graduate from musical comedy, and his film work has limited itself to that of the Edison studio. Mrs. Earl was well known in musical comedy and only left it upon the discovery that housekeeping offered even more fascinating employment. The Earl apartment near the studio testifies as to that, and also to the domesticity of the owner.

By Mabel Condon

"IF," SAID Frank C. Bannon, his hand on the door knob of Gertrude McCoy's dressing room and his head visible within that sanctum, "If," he repeated, "I don't have to go to Fifth avenue with some films, you'll find me in my office when you're through."

"Very well," I replied obediently. Mr. Bannon had showed me the bread line, the newly-built Edison studio and had introduced me to Frank Lyons, the fat man; hence the obedience.

"But," Mr. Bannon countered, "I'm almost certain I'll have to go to Fifth avenue, so I'll say good-bye now." So we of the dressing room replied good-bye to him of the door, and the pleasant Bannon countenance withdrew.

Gertrude McCoy.

"And now," said Miss McCoy, "we'll eat." As though magically summoned, a colored gentleman with a breakfast-food smile and a luncheon tray appeared and proceeded to place the contents of the latter on the little white-clothed table which stood in front of a dressing table, and which, up to then, I hadn't noticed because I hadn't had time.

"Usually," I remarked as we unfolded our napkins, "there isn't room for a luncheon table in a dressing room."

"And usually," replied the hostess, "there isn't room for one in here. But I made room. Mabel Trunelle and I have this room together, but we're going to take Miss Nesbitt's room because it's bigger, and she's to come in here and have this one all to herself. That'll be all for a while, William." and he of the smile quietly disappeared.

"Let's pretend we haven't only just met," suggested Miss McCoy.

So we pretended by Miss McCoy informing that she loves housekeeping and used to have a housekeeping suite of her own and that her greatest pleasure on her one day of recreation, Sunday, was to scrub every floor in the suite; and I told about a kitchenette dinner at which there was company and no bread. Then the smiling one appeared with chicken salad, eggs and a green pot of green tea, and when he had withdrawn the subject turned to that of "The President's Special," the thrilling Edison film which owes its thrills to Miss McCoy.

"I hear," said I, helping myself to an egg of the deviled variety, "that you took a terrific risk in racing that train."

"Oh, not much," returned Miss McCoy, giving herself a helping of the same delicacy. "We were only going forty-five miles an hour."

"And were you using your own little car?"

"Yes, the one that the people around the studio call the 'coffee-grinder,' also 'the rattler.'" She paused, but there was no malice in her hesitancy, only affection for the little car, the top of which was visible even then from its position of "watchful waiting" on the corner across from the studio.

"I know every move of that car so well that on country roads I often rest my elbow on the other seat, put my head on my hand and drive for miles, that way, with one hand. I can see far enough ahead to keep out of danger and it's very restful. There are only a few of the people around here who will ride with me; they think I'm reckless. But with me it isn't recklessness; it's simply going fast. And," she added, "it's doing the thing I'm told I shouldn't do. For there's always more fun in doing what one shouldn't do. Besides, I'm not afraid, so why shouldn't I go fast?"

I knew of no reason and said so, as I accepted the green-rimmed cup of green tea which was passed me.

"So, of course," she went on, "when that part was given me in 'The President's Special,' I wouldn't hear to having such a dandy ride faked. All I had to be was cool-headed and fearless, and all I had to do was to keep the car at its topmost speed, prevent it from infringing on the two-foot distance between it and the train, and to remember to shut off all the brakes when within fifteen feet of the terminal. But I didn't remember; I completely forgot the emergency brake. But I killed the engine, so I stopped all right anyhow."

"Suppose there should have had to be a retake?" I suggested.

"Oh," she replied, deciding on two lumps of sugar instead of one, "I thought we had better do it over in case the first time was not right, so we did it three times. There was everything the matter with the car afterward, but I just tightened up the things that were loose and it's just like always." Not being one of those privileged studio people, I scorned to comment humorously as to that and offered, instead, to pass the salad.

"Fearlessness," I then observed, "must be a trait of your part of the country." I had no idea what part that was.

"Rome, Georgia," my hostess told me. "Yes, I think the people from there are fearless." And added,

"Mr. Seay is from there." I reflected upon the bravery of that Edison director and decided in favor of the Georgians.

"I left home when I was very young," Miss McCoy was saying, "and I came to New York. Because I was tall and slender and blonde, I got into the chorus of 'The Gay White Way'—remember that show?—and because I wasn't afraid of the stage director when he was cross I stayed there until I got something better, in vaudeville.

"But my introduction into pictures was through Ashley Miller. He gave me his card and told me to come to see him at the Edison studio. And a year later I did. I was engaged and have been here, now, four years. You would know what kind of work I like best, wouldn't you?"

"Dramatic?" I guessed.

"Yes, with a great deal of sympathy in them. I dislike comedy roles. It makes me ill to be cast in a comedy," she further expressed her non-preference of this variety of part. "The next picture I'm to play in is 'In Sheep's Clothing.' It promises a likeable role. And after that is to be Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night.' I can hardly wait for that one. And later, maybe, there's to be a series for me. It's not all decided yet, but I'm reasonably certain of it. So far I've most enjoyed 'The Impersonator' and 'The Shattered Tree.' I loved both of them. 'The President's Special' was the most exciting, so, of course, that, too, is among the ones I liked best doing."

William stealthily entered and replaced the salad dishes with ones of cantelope. Then he smiled himself out silently, and the conversation turned to sports, though through no reference to William's display of acrobatics in his faultlessly waiting on table in the little dressing room. Rather, it came about through mention of a play in which Miss McCoy made up as a boy.

"I love to wrestle. People around the studio didn't know it then, but they've remembered it since I put my opponent on the flat of his back during the making of that picture," said Miss McCoy, smiling at the remembrance. "Wrestling and horseback riding are the things I love best. And autoing." The girl across from me with the wide blue eyes and soft southern voice smiled out through the window at the top of the little car, which, though it has been ever faithful, is about to be replaced with a racer, monogramed and dazzlingly white, and capable of even more than forty-five miles an hour.

"I love my little car; I never go anywhere without it," declared the owner of the little car as she rumpled her napkin beside her plate and we rose to give William final right-of-way. "But we must progress," she amended. "We must progress."

We did, Miss McCoy to relieve the little car of further waiting and I to an upstairs office and thence via devious routes—it's so easy to get off of the right car at the wrong station, coming from the "Bron-ix" back to the starting point, Times Square.

Egan Joins Ramo

John S. Egan has been appointed auditor of the Ramo Canadian offices. After familiarizing himself with the trade and meeting the exhibitors in Montreal, under the guidance of Frank W. Foster, Canadian manager, he will make his headquarters at the Toronto office at 11 Richmond street, West. Mr. Egan has just resigned as manager of the camera, kineclair and educational film departments of the Eclair Film Company to connect himself with the Ramo Company, and will no doubt prove himself a valuable asset as he comes from a family of practical film people, being a brother of Mrs. Agnes Egan Cobb, manager of the Leading Players Film Corporation and Features Ideal departments of the Eclair Film Company, and a brother-in-law of C. Lang Cobb, Jr., manager sales and publicity of Ramo Films, Inc.

Horace Plimpton vs. Reckless Realism

It is the belief of Horace G. Plimpton, manager of the negative department of the Edison Company, that there is too much risk taken in the making of pictures. The risk to which he refers is that in which the player figures, and which, so Mr. Plimpton believes, has almost gone beyond the bounds of reason, so keen are the public, the film makers and even the players themselves, for realism in pictures.

Horace Plimpton.

"Many of the risks to life are unnecessary," stated Mr. Plimpton one day last week in his long office on the second floor of the Bronx studio building.

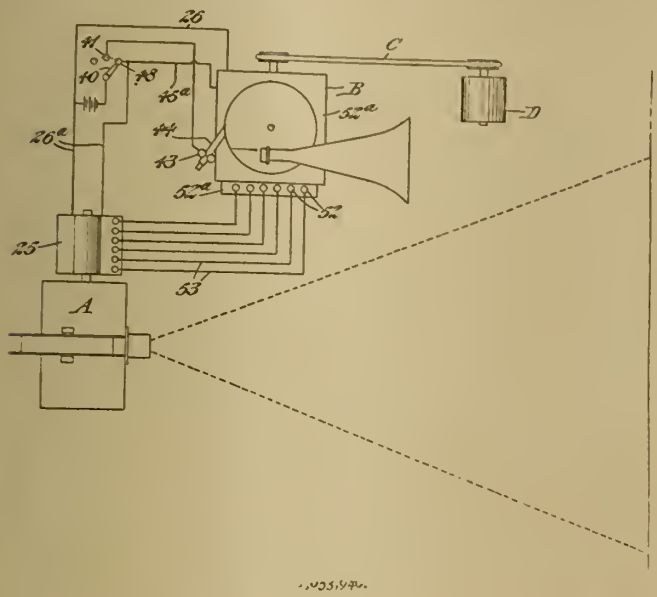
"I don't believe in the players risking their lives," he went on. "The business isn't worth it and never would be, no matter how big it became. Why, the loss of one life at this studio would be a horror that I feel could not be lived down. I would feel terribly about it, should such a catastrophe occur. I'd feel almost personally responsible.

"There are ways of faking almost every risk," Mr. Plimpton continued, "and I would prefer that way to having the players taking their lives in their hands.

"Straight cowardice, of course, would be a different matter. If a player came to me and said, 'I'll do this thing if you want me to, but I don't feel that I'm capable of taking this risk; I'm not in training and don't feel fit to do it,' why, I'd feel he had done the right thing in coming to me and telling me this. But if it were simply a case of 'cold feet' I wouldn't care to have him around.

"Yes, I think the risks people take nowadays for the sake of realism, when the feat could just as well be faked, are unnecessary," concluded the man who gathered an Edison stock company that brought world-wide fame to its owners.

Shipman Leaves Pan-American



Ernest Shipman has disposed of all his interests in the Pan American Film Company and resigned as general manager of that firm. After a few weeks' vacation Mr. Shipman will become active in connection with new plans to be announced later in these columns.

Edward Rosenthal, age 69, secretary and treasurer of the Paragon Film Company of Topeka, Kas., was killed on July 13 while taking pictures near Wausau, Wis. A rock, thrown by a nearby blast, crushed his skull.

Recent Patents in Motography

By David S. Hulfish

Patent No. 1,053,946. For an Improved Synchronizing Device. Issued to Leon Gaumont, Paris, France, assignor to Societe des Etablissements Gaumont, Paris, France. Application filed Jan. 4, 1907.

The phonograph B is driven by the constantly running motor D through the connecting slip-belt C. The phonograph is made ready to start but is held motionless by the stop-latch 44, controlled by the electromagnet 43 in turn controlled by switch point 41 and switch lever 40.

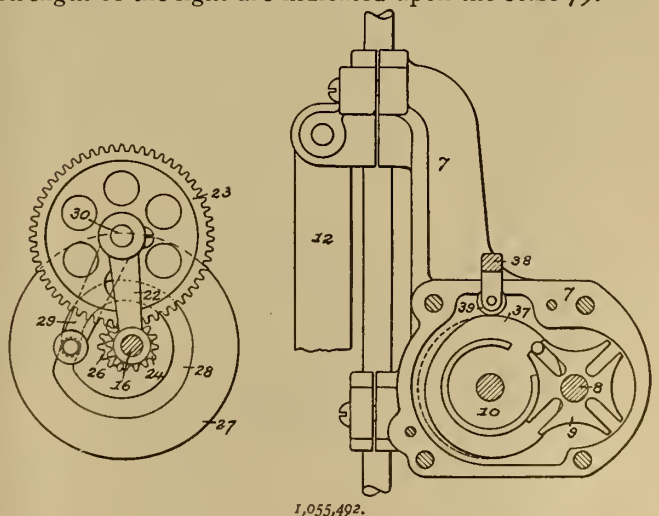
The motor 25 of the kinematograph projector A has an external commutator. It is shown as a multipolar motor with a bipolar armature, and the field coils are connected through the group of conductors 53 to terminal points 52 upon a part 52a of the phonograph B which carries a commutator driven by the phonograph mechanism. As the armature of the motor 25 has its speed controlled absolutely by the magnetic rotation of its fields, and as the fields are controlled by the commutator in connection with the phonograph driving mechanism, it follows that the kinetoscope motor must keep exact pace with the phonograph, and a perfect film in the projector, once placed in synchronism with the phonograph, must necessarily remain in synchronism.

No. 1,055,492. For an Improved Kinetoscope. Issued to Alvah C. Roebuck, Chicago, Ill., assignor to The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., Chicago, Ill. Application filed April 21, 1909.

From the patent as issued:

This invention has for its principal objects, first, to provide an acceleration in the speed of the film feeding drum during the period in which it is imparting intermittent feed to the film, and thus attain a relatively shorter period of the film movement and a correspondingly increased period of film rest during each cycle of the film movements. Second, to provide a tension mechanism for the picture film at its point of exposure which provides a minimum degree of tension at the beginning of the movement of the film and an increase in such tension after the film is in movement. Such increase in tension reaching its maximum when approximately three-fourths of the movement has taken place, and so continuing for approximately one-quarter of the cycle of the feeding mechanism to allow the film to become steady after its movement, the tension then gradually decreases until the minimum point is reached ready for a fresh cycle of the operations just described. With the described variations of the tension the tendency of the film to continue its movement after the feeding mechanism stops, is very effectually prevented.

The feature of acceleration of driving drum speed during the shift is obtained by introducing into the driving train the swinging arm 29 carrying its pinion gears 24 and 26, the arm 29 being given a small swinging movement by action of the cam 28. This swing of the arm 29 increases the drum speed during the shift and compensates by retarding the speed immediately thereafter.



The feature of variable film tension is obtained by placing the cam 37 upon the pin wheel of the Geneva movement, the cam 37 operating through friction roller 39 to lift the member 38 which lifts the tension of the springs in the film gate.

No. 1,056,794. For an Improved Photographic Printing apparatus for Moving-Picture Films. Issued to Albert S. Howell, Chicago, Ill., assignor to Bell & Howell Co., Chicago, Ill. Application filed March 6, 1909.

At the top, reel 23 contains the sensitive film and reel 24 contains the negative. At the bottom, reel 29 takes up the printed film and reel 30 takes up the negative.

An electric lamp within the casing 40 passes light through the negative upon the sensitive film as the two pass together in front of the lamp house. A lever 78 adjusts the amount of light, which must be varied as the negative varies, etc., and the relative printing strength of the light are indicated upon the scale 79.

With these details in mind, the following two claims, selected from the 21 claims of the patent, will be understood and also will serve to explain the invention:

1. In a photographic printing apparatus, including a light conducting passage, means for causing films to travel through said passage in superposed relation, and means adapted to be operated by one of said films for momentarily influencing the points on said films where the quantity of light is to be increased or diminished.

16. In a photographic printing apparatus, having film operating means adapted to move a doubled negative film, the combination of an influencing device, and means controlled by the doubles in the negative film for operating said device.

No. 1,057,059. For an Improved Safety Cell for Motion Picture Projecting Machines. Issued to Charles P. Hubbard, Los Angeles, Calif., assignor of part to Charles F. Eyton, Los Angeles, Calif.

The object of the invention is to provide a heat screen or alum cell whereby danger from fire due to heat in the film window may be eliminated, and further to provide such means as will prevent the device from being tampered with, so that it may become practicable to enact and enforce laws compelling the use of a heat screen in all picture projectors.

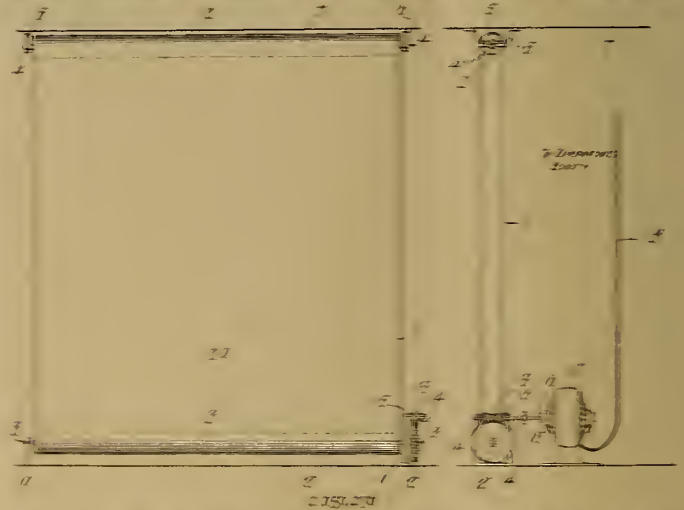
The alum cell in the illustration comprises a metal casing 12 with glass windows 13 and 14 containing the alum solution 17 upon the surface of which solution is supported the float 20. If the cell be not kept full of solution the float 20 will descend and obstruct the light between the windows.

Detail is provided for attaching the device to the projecting machine with an official seal so that it may not be removed without detection, for closing the cell under similar seal that the float 20 may not be removed, and provision is made for filling the cell with liquid without breaking the seals.

Two of the seven claims of the patent are reproduced below, as typical:



1. A heat intercepting cell for motion picture machines comprising a container having oppositely-arranged transparent panes and a light passage through the container between the panes, a transparent liquid heat-intercepting body in the container and a float in the container adapted to be supported by said liquid body and adapted to obstruct the light passage when the liquid is removed from the container.

4. A safety cell for motion picture machines, comprising a container having a light passage therethrough, means to cut off the passage, and a liquid heat screening body to hold said means out of such passage.

No. 1,057,156. For an Improved Motion Picture Screen. Issued to Paul E. Thomason, Charlotte, N. C.

The screen is designed to display a plain white canvas for the projection of motion pictures, and to change this for a decorative screen or for an advertising screen at other times.

The device is controlled from the operator's booth in the simplest manner possible, merely by a switch to start or stop a motor, the motor running always in the same direction.

The patent has one very descriptive claim, which in connection with the illustration will explain the device.

A device of the character specified, comprising an endless belt having on the outer face thereof a display portion and a plain portion of approximately the same size, upper and lower supporting rollers for the belt, a worm gear wheel secured to one end of one roller, a motor having a worm shaft provided with a worm meshing with the worm wheel, and means for controlling the motor from a distance.

PERSONAL NOTES

James B. Kirk is the new publicity manager for Warners' Features, Inc., and after seeing the accompanying photograph of him, you'd pick him out of any crowd. His hair is as curly as this page shows it to be—unfortunately, the page does not also show its color. The only remedy for that is to tell you that in its early days it undoubtedly was red, but has mellowed with the brief years and is now of a subdued russet tint. The eyes, below it, are gray and bright and there's a pleasant quickness of manner about Mr. Kirk that makes of this tall, slender publicity man, one whose friendship is valued. He has taken the Wanrer publicity chair by virtue of extensive service on newspapers and magazines and with agencies. His work scattered itself over reportorial, editorial and special staffs of newspapers throughout the west to Denver and the south to Atlanta. Then followed the editorship of Profitable Advertising, a Boston magazine of publicity. He contributed stories and verse to magazines and pictorial publications, and, in the brightest days of the Hampton Advertising Company, New York, served as its managing editor. For the last several years he acted as producing manager of the Blackman-Ross Advertising Agency, and from there came to Warner's, where he is now the chief of publicity. His ability speaks for itself and his personality is sponser for the number of friends who are already his in film brotherhood.

A four-reel film version of the famous novel "The Opened Shutters," by Clara Louise Burnham, is being produced by Director Otis Turner at the Universal Pacific Coast studios. The scenario for this powerful story was written by Lois Weber (Mrs. Phillips Smalley) and the cast includes Herbert Rawlinson, Frank Lloyd, William Worthington and Anna Little.

"Sylvia Grey," a five-reel subject in which Helen Gardner will take the lead, is being produced at the Vitagraph studio under the direction of Mr. Charles Gaskill.

Manager Harmeyer of the Fine Arts Theater, Chicago, where Annette Kellerman is being shown in "Neptune's Daughter," says the majority of his nights are spent trying to figure out how he can display photos of the fair Diana of the waves in his lobby without having some deeply smitten youth extract them as an added decoration for his den. The supply of pictures Mr. Harmeyer has on hand are fast diminishing and he fears he has reached a crisis.

The announcement of the wedding on June 24 of N. Paul Stoughton, auditor of exchange for the Universal, and Viola Van Loan, formerly an assistant secretary to J. C. Graham, has been received by Mr. Stoughton's many friends throughout the industry. The marriage ceremony took place at Riverside, Ill.

A correction is hereby made of the item which appeared in this magazine of the date of July 18 and which referred to the betrothal of C. Alfred Karpen and Miss Jessie H. Christie, of Brooklyn. As far as announcement of the engagement is concerned, the item was correct, but unfortunately it wound up with a premature reference to Miss Christie as "Mrs. Karpen." Herewith the correction and an apology is made to Miss Christie and Mr. Karpen.

Ned Burton, who for the past fourteen months has been a member of the Pathe Freres Stock Company, has been specially engaged to play the part of "Horigan," the grafting politician, in "The Man of the Hour," now being filmed at Fort Lee, N. J., by the Peerless Feature Film Company, the new organization of the Brady-Shubert-Eclair Companies.

Don Meaney, formerly advertising manager of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, has accepted the position of advertising and sales manager for the Photo Play Productions Company of New York City. The first picture issued by this concern is "The Littlest Rebel." Mr. Meaney's office will be in the Candler building, New York City. His host of Chicago friends unite in congratulating both Don and the Photo Play Productions Company, for the two should make a tremendous success.

Edwin August, who recently left the Balboa Company, is in New York at the present time, completing plans which he has mapped out.

Grace Cunard, Kathlyn Williams, Flo La Badie and Pearl White are deluged with letters daily since they have appeared as heroines in the various serial films and all of them keep their pens busy during their spare time trying to answer all the correspondence.

Pauline Bush is starting on a three-reel picture in which the action of the story takes place around the sulphur mines of Iceland. In order to get the proper atmosphere Miss Bush, with her director, Joe De Grasse, Joe King and Lon Chaney are going to Mount Lassen, the California volcano, which has been so active of late. It is the intention of the director to get as close to the edge of the crater as possible in order to get realistic settings.

George Kleine made a flying trip from Chicago to New York last week in connection with important affairs of his New York office. Mr. Klein is preparing to launch a surprise in the form of a multiple reel release which he claims will make former mighty subjects look tame.

Myrtle Stedman, of Bosworth, Inc., has received a very handsome skin coat from an admirer at Moose Jaw, Canada. It is similar in every respect to the coat she wore in a couple of Jack London's northern stories.

Wilfred Lucas, who is directing the "Trey of Hearts" series for Universal, is still suffering from a snapped bone near his shoulder, but refuses to do a thing to it until this long series has been completed, though he suffers considerable pain.

Recent reports from Ireland have it that Sidney Olcott is driving a yellow automobile about Ireland and getting away with it. The report also goes as far as to state that the color of the car is almost orange. All of which speaks well for the popularity of the able director.

Mrs. W. J. Barry, of Woodlawn, Chicgo, has terminated a pleasant visit with her son, William Barry, better known to the trade as "6A Bill Barry," of the Nicholas Power Company. For two weeks Mr. Barry was escort and guide, and as a result Mrs. Barry can say she has truly seen New York.

Mrs. P. W. Snowhook of Chicago, mother of the trio known there as just "the Snowhook boys," has been the guest of her cousins, Philip and Elizabeth Lonergan at their home in Brooklyn, for the past ten days. "The Snowhook boys" are Dick of the Snowhook & Wheeler Film Exchange, John of Chicago newspaper prestige, and Teddy of the Pathe Company.

"Come, and bring just your bathing suit" was the invitation which was responsible for "Bill" Barry's and Wen Milligan's absence from Broadway from Saturday till Wednesday. A stag party on a sixty-foot launch was not to be sniffed at, was their opinion.

Arthur J. Lang again has his name at the top of a well-written and illustrated article entitled "Behind the Scenes of Motion Pictures," in which the history of the Nicholas power machine is detailed. There is interesting reading in the article which appears in the July number of the Export American Industries magazine.

After securing a monkey to be used in the All-Star Feature Corporation production, "The Nightingale," a representative of that company was refused permission to transport the little animal to the studio on a subway car, and was forced to secure a taxi-cab, for which $10 was paid. Having broken into the expense account it was decided altogether fitting that the little creature should have a name, "Taxy" being the cognomen which was selected.

Just before Sid Olcott produced "From the Manger to the Cross" he made a hurry trip to London, wiring a friend to have "twelve apostles ready to return with him." Said friend complied and the apostles were ready. Upon his arrival in Ireland recently to make several feature films the dynamic director was met by Jack Melville, previously employed as juvenile, who greeted him with, "Well, here's one of your apostles back on the job."

Sol Lesser, president and general manager of the All Star Feature Distributors of the Pacific Coast, arrived in

New York last week with wondrous tales of the reception which is being accorded the productions of the All Star Feature Corporation in the west. He mentions "The Jungle" as being especially popular in that part of the country.

Miss Winnifred Greenwood, of the American Company, in the picture entitled "False Gods" appears in the role of a simple western woman introduced into the most fashionable eastern society, a part in which she excells. Her acting, at all times versatile, is tested to the utmost in portraying this character but she proves herself a master of her art.

The acting of Myrtle Stedman as "Saxon" in the Bosworth production of "The Valley of the Moon" is said to be the best piece of work this little lady has done. The film is now showing at Tally's Broadway theater in Los Angeles where Miss Stedman saw it for the first time last week.

Edna Maison, directed by Lloyd Ingraham, played the lead in "The Storm Bird," a romance of the docks and seashore which was put on in San Diego, Cal., recently and was surprised at the reception she received upon her arrival in that city. She is an old time favorite in San Diego, for she used to visit there with the California Opera Company when her spirited acting and dancing and her beautiful voice captivated the inhabitants.

Miss Charlotte Burton of the "Flying A" blossomed out into a bewitching bride last week, not in real life, but in "Converting Dad," a two reel production. Several visitors at the studio were so captivated by her appearance that they took a number of pictures of her with their kodaks and she is now anxiously awaiting the results.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believoing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, Motography has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in Motography as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

BORDER

THIS stirring story of the Mexican border-land is conceded by critics to be the best film of its kind yet produced. Its remarkable success is due to the originality of the scenario, the realism of the pictures and the splendid acting of Miss Grace McHugh, the gifted star who lost her life in its production. It is somewhat consoling to reflect that in this great drama, Miss McHugh has bequeathed to us an example of her work at the height of her powers. The part of Anita, the Mexican smuggler's daughter, is exactly suited to her. From her first meeting with the American trooper, through all the intrigues, conspiracies, fighting and love-making, to the break-neck night ride for the troops to save her sweetheart and back in the gray dawn at their head, her work is marked by superb technique, marvelous poise and undaunted courage.

What the Critics Say

From the Motion Picture News:—"The picture can take its place with the foremost pictures of its kind. Warner's Features control the picture, and in their projection room, where the censors and reviewers witnessed the production, it was acclaimed without one dissenting voice the best yet."

From the New York Telegraph:—"To the obvious advantages of being a timely play, 'Across the Border' adds the assets of good photography, good action and a setting which makes an excellent background against which to project lively action of the hard-riding, hard-shooting type."

A Gripping Story of the North

Frenchman Avenges Wrong

BUILT upon a big, gripping plot and distinguished by backgrounds of superior grandeur, Lubin's "The Wolf," now ready for release through the Special Feature Department of the General Film Company, is one of the most appealing plays of its class this reviewer has been privileged to witness for many months.

From the moment the first complication appears, early in the first reel, until the final fade-out, the element of suspense is sustained and the numerous crises which bob up and down throughout are certain to keep any audience in a constant state of uncertainty. The fight between the two men near the close of the last reel is very effective, as it clearly gives the impressions of a death struggle. When one of the men is seen to fall and it is impossible to make out which one it is, a powerful crisis is developed, which is disposed of by having the victor strike a match, exposing the face of the man he has conquered.

The settings are, as has been stated above, wonderful. They show the broad expanse of forest covered with ice and snow in the coldest months of winter and again in all their grandeur in the Indian summer. The river scenes are well chosen and in every one the camera has been placed so as to bring in some appealing bit of woodland. A snow scene showing a frozen lake with a mountain in the distance is especially worthy of mention. The photography is very good and the clear effects of the snow scenes are a credit to the camera man.

Baptistie returns from his trip to the Far North.

Great care has been exercised by Director Barry O'Neil in handling all the details of the production and it is in every way a true interpretation of the original play by Eugene Walter. The acting is splendid, each character being given a distinct personality. The work of Miss Ethel Clayton, George Soule Spencer, and Ruth Bryant are perhaps the strongest of the cast, but every one of the supporting players carries his or her part perfectly and all are to be complimented on the artistic production they have helped to make "The Wolf."

The opening scenes of the picture show the return of Baptistie, a wandering trapper, to the only home he knows, a little cabin near a trading post of the Hudson Bay Company in the snow-covered regions of Canada. In this cabin an old-fashioned French-Canadian couple await him, as does Annette, a half-breed girl, their adopted daughter, with whom the trapper is in love. All is happiness while Baptistie remains with them, but soon he has to go again into the far north to trap.

Not long after her lover leaves, Annette meets a stranger from the States, MacDonald by name, a surveyor, who is a man without honor and who is known to his friends as "The Wolf." His good looks and pleasant manners draw Annette to him and when he promises to make her his wife and take her back to the Southland with him she surrenders herself to his love.

His work finished, MacDonald returns to his home, telling Annette that he will return. With his departure the girl realizes the awful sin she has committed, and worry over it causes her to lose her mind. She confesses her deed, but will not tell MacDonald's name. One night when she is left alone, she steals from the cabin, determined to follow her false lover. She does not get far, however, as a blizzard comes up and after struggling through it until she becomes exhausted, she falls. The next morning a band of searchers from the trading post find the remains of her body, the wolves having torn her to pieces.

A few days later Baptistie returns and none can bear to break the news to him until Father Paul, the missionary and the trapper's dearest friend, tells him of the terrible fate of his sweetheart. His grief is overcome by his determination for vengeance and he vows he will kill the man who has taken Annette away from him, but Father Paul finally quiets him and leads him to his cabin.

A few days later Jules Beaubien arrives at the post from Montreal and asks if a girl by the name of Annette lives in the vicinity. The natives look upon him with disdain as they believe he is the man who is responsible for her ruin. Baptistie learns of the presence of the stranger and determines to kill him. He follows Jules to Father Paul's cabin and is about to murder him when the missionary interferes. Jules then tells them why he seeks Annette. Years before his father had gone through this country as a trader and had met a squaw and to them little Annette was born. The squaw died and the little girl was left with a family who promised to raise her as their daughter. On his death bed Jules' father had made him promise that he would find Annette and that he would educate and care for her. The men of the north hear Jules' story through and then Father Paul tells him of his sister's death. Baptistie and he vow that they who loved her will seek the man who caused her death and when they find him take his life in payment.

The long search binds Jules and Baptistie closely together and though a winter and summer pass without finding the man they seek they doggedly tramp on, never wavering in their determination. They stop in a deserted cabin near the home of MacTavish, who lives with his daughter Hilda, a lovable girl who has been mistreated by her father all her life. Jules falls in love with her and she returns his affection, but Baptistie reminds him of the duty before them and Jules tells the girl he must leave, but that he will return the moment he has fulfilled his vow.

The avengers again take to the trail to follow their man and it is not long after their departure that MacDonald and an assistant named Huntley arrive in the district near MacTavish's home, and again the "Wolf" sees a pretty face. He wins the confidence of the old man and the surveyors make their home in the little cabin with Hilda and her father. Again MacDonald starts to ruin an innocent girl, but before he can succeed Baptistie and Jules return and Hilda knows she loves Jules better than the newcomer.

The men who have sought vengeance so long suspect at once that MacDonald is the fiend they are seeking and their suspicions are confirmed when the "Wolf" brags to Jules that he will get Hilda as he did a girl named Annette on his last trip into this region.

Jules controls himself and instead of killing the other on the spot he determines he will make him fight and tells Baptistie that if he should fall it will then be his duty to avenge Annette. MacDonald, fearing Jules may take Hilda away before he gets her, makes a deal with MacTavish, exchanging some valuable land for the privilege of taking the girl to New York with him.

Huntley, however, tells the men who seek the "Wolf's" life of his plan to go away, and they go to the cabin. Hilda is rescued and Jules, Baptistie and Huntley go down stream with her, followed by the "Wolf." They reach a portage and Jules sends the others ahead and waits for the coming of the man he intends to kill. The "Wolf" arrives and the men engage in a fight as the darkness of the forest closes down upon them. The struggle is a long one, but at last a form rises; he stands in a triumphant pose for a moment and then bends over his fallen foe and strikes a match, disclosing the features of MacDonald. Jules has avenged his sister's death!

He then joins his sweetheart and his friends and tells Baptistie that their vow has been fulfilled. Then they enter the canoe and paddle away from the scene of their sorrow, toward the happiness which awaits them in the South.

Attractive Lobby Display

The Newman Manufacturing Company of Cincinnati, Ohio, has a very attractive lobby display, which is illustrated herewith. It consists of some brass fittings supporting a frame of brass tubing, in the center of which a regular one sheet frame is suspended on two rings. A display card on the top of the brass frame calls attention to date of the attraction. The poster frame in this piece of display apparatus is equipped with the well known Newman quick detachable back, which has proven so popular among exhibitors. A new catalog containing a complete list of the Newman fixtures will be sent to any exhibitor who will write to the company, mentioning this publication.

Eclectic Releasing Thrilling Films

Unique Subjects Shown

IF IT WERE possible to induce Pauline to consider seriously the dangers into which her love of adventure is leading her the thrill contained in the tenth episode of "The Perils of Pauline" ought to come pretty close to accomplishing it.

In this release she has the doubtful pleasure of riding a breeches buoy from a lighthouse tower to the distant shore, being ducked in the water frequently on the way and closely pursued by Owen's hired gangsters who give chase in a rowboat.

Pauline sought excitement in entering upon this daring trip, but it turned out too strenuous even for her broadened idea of risk. The lively way in which she fights her captors is typical of the rock-bottom nerve which has been characteristic of her since the beginning of the series.

At the end of the last episode Harry foolishly hoped that Pauline's desire for adventures, which inevitably led to grave dangers, had been fully gratified by her narrow escape in the aeroplane, but he was soon to learn his mistake.

Owen overhears Harry's plan.

Returning from a gallop one morning, Pauline astonished Harry with the information that she was ready for another adventure, and if he wouldn't plan one for her she would appeal to Owen. Rather than have the latter happen, Harry promises a visit to a smuggler's den. Owen overhears and at once plans a way to have Pauline disappear and himself escape suspicion.

Pauline is visited one morning by four men clad in seaman's apparel, who claim to come from Harry with instructions to accompany her to the seashore. She consents and is taken to a deserted house which she discovers is meant as her prison. The kidnapers pull the telephone from the wall and consider communication impossible, but Pauline manages to mend the wires and notifies Harry of her danger before the guard learns of the trick. Fearing outside interference with Owen's plans, the gangsters move her to a distant lighthouse and row away.

In the meantime Harry has set out in haste for the location given him over the telephone, but finds the place deserted. A handkerchief lying on the ground furnishes him a clue as to the direction taken by the kidnapers and he starts out in pursuit. He meets a boy on the road who informs him that an auto filled with strange-looking people has just preceded him. Taking the boy along, he hurries ahead and reaches the shore opposite the lighthouse. Sure enough, Pauline is signaling from the upper window, but there is no way of getting across.

The escape from the lighthouse.

With the help of the boy he opens the doors of the coast life-saving station and obtains the breeches buoy apparatus. By careful aiming of the canon he manages to send the projectile, to which a rope is attached, into the lighthouse window. Pauline hauls in the rope, climbs into the buoy and is pulled by means of the trolley toward the opposite shore. When only part way across the gangsters discover the attempt at escape, turn their boats and follow in pursuit, but again the canon and its projectiles are brought into service and as a result the boat is overturned.

Arriving safely at the shore, Pauline is warmly welcomed by Harry, and together they watch the struggles of the floundering kidnapers.

In the sultan's harem.

THE wonderful interiors are one of the strongest assets of "The Corsair," an adventurous tale of the days of the buccaneers, produced in four reels by the Eclectic Company. The oriental settings are a marvel in studio construction and arrangement. Seldom does one see a scene that can compare with that of the sultan's harem; the beautiful draperies, costly rugs and tapestries, the queerly engraved woodwork, and the tank of water with a running fountain all denote effort to produce a masterpiece regardless of expense or trouble.

Medora and the corsair escape.

The story is fascinating because of its spirit of adventure and recklessness, and when acted by a cast of popular Pathe players contains all the essentials of quick action, connected scenes, and unusual events which go to make up an interesting picture and hold an audience from first reel to last without any yawning accompaniments.

Frank Powell directed the picture and can justly feel proud of the way the scenes are handled, generally and individually. The photography is excellent, tinted in the cave and night scenes, and bright and clear where appropriate.

The story follows:

On a raid by the corsairs, several slaves are captured, among them a very beautiful Greek girl, Medora. The lieutenant who has been in charge of the expedition casts covetous eyes on Medora and desires her for his personal harem. She is afraid of the man and on arriving at the headquarters of the band appeals to the head of the corsairs for protection. He takes her for himself and tells the lieutenant to pick one of the other girls. The lieutenant becomes very angry and attacks his chief. The chief gets the better of him and throws him out of the band. The lieutenant, thirsting for revenge, goes to the sultan and tells him of the plans of the band. The sultan has been looking for an opportunity to break up the band for some time and gives the lieutenant some soldiers to go to the home of the corsairs and secure the beautiful slave. The expedition is successful and in the absence of the chief they carry off the slaves.

The lieutenant, however, does not say anything of the booty which is hidden in the cave, as he intends to return alone some other time to secure it. When the chief corsair returns he is told of the attack by his father, who has seen the whole proceeding. The corsair is aroused and plans a ruse to get Medora back. Medora has been taken to the sultan, who places her in his harem and makes her one of his favorites. The corsairs dress up as women and go to the palace. The chief poses as a slave dealer and gains admittance to show the sultan his beautiful captives.

When in the interior of the palace they cast aside their disguises and attack the harem guards. They are repulsed, however, and the chief is made a prisoner. On Medora's suggestion he is put in a cell to await torture. That evening the lieutenant goes to the cave to secure the booty. He is successful in gaining admittance to the storeplace and proceeds to take the choice of the valuables. The same evening Medora plans to escape with the corsair. She gains admittance to the prison and is successful in getting the corsair out. They proceed to a boat and row away to the former hiding place of the band. When they arrive they discover the lieutenant in the act of cleaning out the booty. Following him back to the cave, the corsair closes the secret door, locking the lieutenant in so that he cannot escape. The corsair and Medora then sail away, leaving the lieutenant to his fate.

ONE of the Eclectic Film Company's latest releases is a five-reel detective play, entitled "Detective Craig's Coup." The plot is built on New York gang life and is full of action, unusual situations, and interesting developments.

The photography and scenes are fine. Some of the settings that merit special mention are those showing the interior of the cafe and the counterfeiter's workshop.

Pathe stars are seen in the cast, which is composed of Francis Carlyle, as Detective Craig; Pearl Sindelar, as Mae; Jack Standing, as Bob Brierly; Charles Arling, as James Dalton, and Ned Burton, as the banker, Gibson. With this able cast it is hardly necessary to mention that the character portrayals are of the best.

Bob Brierly, a wealthy young fellow of good parentage, spends all his money in high living. Wandering partly intoxicated along a street one night he meets Mae, a poor girl, whose drawn features tell the story of her struggle for existence. Later Bob meets the girl again and falls in love with her.

In the meantime a band of counterfeiters have been giving the police a great deal of trouble, and Detective Craig has been assigned the task of running them down. Bob Brierly meets James Dalton one night at a cafe and, in a drunken stupor, accepts some money from him. The place is raided by Craig and his detectives and Brierly found to be in possession of counterfeit money. He is arrested and sentenced to two years' imprisonment on circumstantial evidence.

Mae believes in Bob's innocence and, on his release from prison, secures him a position in the bank in which she is employed. The couple get married and start anew in life with a bright future before them. Dalton, the leader of the counterfeiters, learns of Bob's position and notifies the bank of his record. Bob is promptly discharged. Out of work and unable to find anything to do, he finally yields to Dalton's persuasions and agrees to join the band. Later he is stricken by his conscience and writes his former employer, Banker Gibson, of the plans to rob his bank. The note is intercepted by Craig, who decides to scoop the whole band. When the attempt to rob the vault is made the police capture the gang. Banker Gibson recognizes Bob and points him out to Craig, who informs him that Bob is entirely innocent, and shows the warning addressed to him.

When Mae arrives at the police station to plead for her husband she is astonished and delighted to learn from Craig that not only is her husband to be freed, but he is also to be restored to his former position in the bank.

"WHEN A WOMAN LOVES" is an unusually clever three-part drama produced by the Eclectice Company and released during July. The keystone of the plot is the misunderstanding which springs up between a newly married and devoted couple; the young wife mistakes her husband's strict application to his work as being indifference. He, in turn, is made to believe that his wife is untrue, and the resulting jealousy goads him to the point of committing crime. His wife's true love saves him from his rashness.

The story is stirring, interestingly complicated and worked out, and the acting much above the ordinary. The climax is approached gradually, giving the picture a well-balanced and finished effect. The interpretation of the characters is especially good, and combined with the deep settings, well directed schemes and fine photography makes a production worthy a place on any program.

Henry Warring's work continually interferes with his enjoying any of the social events to which he and his pretty wife, Eleanora, are invited. Not understanding why her husband seems oblivious to all things when he has work to do, she concludes it is a plain case of negligence and acts accordingly, accepting every invitation received, whether her husband accompanies her or not.

Harry Lighthall, a friend of Warring's, meets Eleanora and accompanies her home from several parties and dances. He falls in love with her and tries to turn her against her husband on the plea that she is entitled to attention and pleasure and is only being neglected by Warring.

In spite of all Eleanora remains faithful to her husband, and when she is invited to a mask ball, at which she knows Lighthall would particularly like to see her, she plans to remain at home and send her maid instead.

The maid being about Eleanora's size is easily mistaken for her, and attends the ball with the Lighthall party. At the time for unmasking the maid asks to be escorted home and Lighthall agrees, thinking it is merely some whim.

In the meantime Warring has become suspicious of Lighthall and attends the ball for the purpose of watching him. He knows that his wife has hired a pierrot costume for the event, and when he sees Lighthall paying undivided attention to a woman in such a costume he naturally thinks it is his wife.

Arriving at home, Warring upbraids his wife for unfaithfulness, and in the heat of his anger throws her to the floor. As he stands over her, still holding the pistol he had intended to use on her escort, Lighthall and the pierrot enter. Warring is astonished. He rushes to the maid, pulls off the mask, and at once realizes the injustice he has done his wife. Eleanora recovers consciousness as Warring is threatening Lighthall with the pistol. She assures him that she had never loved Lighthall and, as the intruder leaves, the happy couple mutually promise not to doubt each other again.

Bon Ray Studio Nearing Completion

One of the largest consignments of motion picture manufacturing machinery ever received in an American film factory was delivered to the Bon Ray Film Company at Woodside, L. I., last week. This consisted of six fast continuous printers, four step printers, twelve perforators and many smaller devices. The Bon Ray plant is now rapidly nearing completion and will probably be in operation within the next two weeks. With the machinery now being installed, it is believed that a product aggregating close to six million feet per month will be possible.

Much of the machinery just received has been especially built for the Bon Ray Company and represents the inventions of J. Roy Hunt, who is the superintendent of the new factory. The Hunt process of film production enables the Bon Ray Company to handle its films entirely by machinery from the time they leave the printing room until they reach the joiners.

The Bon Ray factory represents an investment of over $100,000 in machinery and in improvements to the buildings, which are shown by the accompanying illustration. The plant comprises three city blocks and the property is being rapidly improved by landscape gardeners. The water supply is secured from a well, three hundred feet in depth, and is delivered to the factory at a temperature of less than 50 degrees. The air in the plant is conditioned by a special mechanism installed for that express purpose and the developing rooms are cooled by refrigeration. A duplex heating system and a fully equipped kitchen and dining room are also found in the buildings.

The releasing plans for the Bon Ray Film Company will be announced within a few weeks. The president of the company is F. E. Holliday, formerly with the Gaumont Company, and the secretary and treasurer is A. B. Roberts.

C. J. Hite Honored

Charles J. Hite of New Rochelle has received recognition from the Smithsonian Institute and the commendation of its scientific members, for his submarine expedition sent to the Bahamas in April. This expedition obtained the only motion pictures extant of life under the sea. Mr. Hite took the pictures to Washington last week and offered the Smithsonian Institute the first view of them. The result was that many of the scientists went also to the National Press Club where Mr. Hite, accompanied by J. E. and George Williamson, and Carl Gregory, expert cameraman, explained to the Washington correspondents, the dangers of robbing the sea of its long held secrets.

Mr. Hite in commenting on the expedition to the Smithsonian scientists said: "When the navigation of the air was made possible the world looked on in wonder. The first flights of the Wrights were hailed with amazement and press and public bowed in adulation. Conquest of the air had attracted the daring and ingenuity of man for years. The deep had told nothing. Except from the lips of divers, who have descended to the shallow depth of 100 feet, the world has lived in total ignorance of the life beneath the sea. Science has evolved little thus far beyond telling soil and sounding the depths.

"No man, until the Williamson invention was made practicable, could tell of the life below. The wonders of the Yosemite or Glacier park could not be estimated by weighing a handful of gravel, taken from those beauty places, nor could man picture the wonders of the deep by gazing upon a bit of sand, drawn up on a dead line. The new invention brings to science the sea's actualities of life, the long lost ships, the Imperators of other days, the hidden reefs, the variegated corals, the moving things. That is why the Smithsonian Institute has applauded our efforts and I, who offered support to this wonderful invention, feel proud. It has spelled success, and proved a real step in scientific progress."

A complete log of the expedition is to be presented the Smithsonian Institute to remain in its archives.

Novel Scenic Film

What is probably one of the most novel scenic pictures made was released by the Thanhauser Company on July 26. Its unusual qualities are not in the pictures themselves, but in their presentation.

While taking a scene for "The Million Dollar Mystery" in Washington it was decided to take some pictures of the famous buildings. Lloyd Lonergan worked a story around them to relieve the panoramic effect they would otherwise have had and the result is most interesting. The cast contains Marguerite Snow, Carey L. Hastings, and James Cruze.

The story is of a girl whose time, when not actively engaged over a wash tub, is spent reading the society section of the newspapers. She falls asleep and dreams that both she and her lover are gifted with the power to travel through the air. They visit the famous places in the capitol city, coming down out of the air right before the camera. In this way one sees views of the Washington Monument, the old Custer-Lee mansion, government buildings, noted hotels, and the Capitol and at the same time is entertained by the humorous turns in the story.

Liberty Films Soon Ready

The Liberty Motion Picture Company, incorporated under the laws of the state of Delaware, has erected a model motion picture plant at Germantown, Philadelphia. Howard J. Bobb is general manager of this new concern, which will make a specialty of releasing photoplays of the Northwest and Canadian type. The first four efforts of the Liberty studio have been completed and will soon be on the market. Max Milligan, an erstwhile stage producer, has been appointed head director. He is surrounded by a number of capable film actors and actresses. C. D. Grunner will be studio manager. The publicity and advertising department will be under the direction of Bennie Zeidman, who was until lately connected with the Lubin Film Manufacturing Company.

Love Is Proven the Greatest Law

Paul McAllister Stars

THE first appearance of Paul McAllister in motion pictures is an artistic success and the manner in which his vehicle, "The Scales of Justice," has been staged reflects great credit upon the Famous Players Film Company.

The star's portrayal of the district attorney, who is forced to decide between love and duty, is a masterful piece of silent acting and each of the supporting players contributes his or her share to the excellence of the production. Miss Jane Fearnley in the woman lead is extremely convincing during the many emotional scenes she is called upon to enact. The work of little Catherine Lee is clever and attractive.

The exterior locations are splendidly selected and the interior sets are true in every detail, the court-room scene being a masterpiece of its kind. The photography is of the highest quality throughout and at no time wavers from the high standard which has been established by this company. Through the entire five reels not a single dull moment appears, so carefully is the plot constructed, and the interest is sustained to the closing scenes when justice removes the obstacle from the path of true love. The work originally was a drama on the legitimate stage, John Reinhart being the author.

Much attention has been given to the subtitles and they are clear and concise and help the story development without at any time becoming cumbersome.

As the story is told, Robert Darrow, district attorney of Russellville, meets and loves Edith Dexter, a young widow, grand-daughter of Phillip Russell, the community's leading citizen. Russell wants Edith to marry the son of his life-long friend, Walter Elliot, to whom he has given the management of his business. Elliot, unknown to his benefactor, has juggled with the firm's money, and the old man, discovering a shortage, telephones Walcott, his legal adviser, to go over the books and see what is wrong. Elliot learns this, fears Walcott will discover the truth, and hopes to make certain changes in the ledgers before it is too late. That night Edith gives a lawn-party, and Darrow is the favored guest. Old Russell observes that she is slighting Elliot, and a violent quarrel follows. In a frenzy, Edith at last seizes a paper-knife, threatening to take her life if her grandfather does not cease his persecution.

Edith's garden party.

The grandfather objects to Edith's love for Darrow.

Miss Tripp, an old maid, and Elliot, witness the quarrel, and the former believes Edith to be threatening her grandfather. That night Phillip Russell, while going over the books alone, is struck down and his murderer flees. On account of the recent quarrel, and because she inherits the bulk of the old man's fortune, Edith is suspected. Darrow protects Edith, and against his own sense of duty, conceals the knife he finds on her person. Bill Crump, a horse thief, is discovered lurking about the premises, and is finally charged with the crime, but as no proof can be found against him, the affair is temporarily suspended.

But Elliot, being finally rejected by Edith, engages a detective to whom he gives clues which seemingly convict Edith, and in spite of Darrow's great love, he is forced to sign the warrant for her arrest. While in prison, Crump, awaiting his sentence for horse-stealing, is befriended and comforted by little Alice, Edith's child. The night before the trial, Darrow, torn between the conflicting forces of love and duty, goes to Edith and tells her that alive the evidence against her could not be wrested from him, but dead it can be easily taken from his hand. From his frenzied manner Edith divines that he contemplates suicide to liberate her, and she urges him to do his duty and prosecute her, telling him that the truth will in some way come to their rescue. Darrow lacks her faith, and he goes home to spend a sleepless night.

Crump overhears Edith's plea with Darrow, and this determines him to a great decision, for he, too, has been struggling between two strong emotions, love and fear. The trial takes place, and Darrow is forced to cross-examine the woman he loves, as she stands on trial for her life. If he remain true to his oath to the state, he must produce the concealed and condemning evidence; if he remain faithful to the woman, he must sacrifice honor and duty. In a paroxysm of grief he breaks down during the cross-examination, and resigns his office rather than publicly prosecute his fiancee. But the love of little Alice has conquered the hardened Crump, who comes forward and confesses that he had seen the real murderer strike the fatal blow, and that fear had kept him silent until that moment, when sympathy proved stronger than terror. Crump goes to serve his sentence, a happier man than ever before, and Darrow takes up his life anew, having learned that love is the greatest law and outweighs all else in the scales of justice.

Darrow decides that love outweighs all else in the scales of justice.

The cast for the production is as follows:

Robert Darrow	Paul McAllister
Edith Russell Dexter	Jane Fearnley
Frank Dexter	Harold Lockwood
Walter Elliot	Hal Clarendon
Phillip Russell	Mark Price
Alice Dexter	Catherine Lee
Angelina	Mary Blackburn
Miss Tripp	Beatrice Moreland

Porter and Ford Return

Edwin S. Porter, technical director of the Famous Players Film Company, and Hugh Ford, the acknowledged master in the Broadway theaters of stage direction, who recently abandoned the legitimate stage and joined the producing staff of the Famous Players Film Company, returned last week from a four months' trip to Europe where they succeeded in accomplishing photographic feats which never before have been even attempted.

Their first picture was "The Eternal City," in which Pauline Frederick will be starred and the scenes which they secured in Rome will mark a new era in dramatic picturization.

For what is alleged to be the first time in the history of motion pictures they succeeded in filming the Vatican, the Coliseum, and in fact every historical and beautiful spot in the Imperial City. It is said to be the first time that the authorities of Rome have given permission for the ancient city to be put upon the screen, and the importance of this achievement both from a commercial as well as from an artistic and historical standpoint, cannot be overestimated.

Messrs. Porter and Ford also succeeded in arranging to use thousands of the soldiery as well as hundreds of railway and government officials and, in fact, succeeded in immortalizing with absolutely perfect detail, every phase of Hall Caine's wonderful story, in its outdoor aspects.

They found however, in spite of the general belief to the contrary, that it was impossible to obtain a studio of the magnitude necessary to properly reproduce the interior scenes as the Famous Players demands they should be done, and after searching not only Italy, but Paris and London as well, they came back to America where the enormous studio of the Famous Players Film Company on West Twenty-sixth street, New York, could be utilized.

There was one point, however, that the American directors agreed upon, to be far superior abroad, and that was the cheapness as well as intelligence of the supernumeraries. "The Italian extra people seemed to have far more appreciation of what the picture and scene meant and of what they were supposed to be expressing," said Mr. Porter, "while their rate of pay is so low that it is possible to use far greater numbers in making spectacular scenes than could be employed without bankrupting an American producer."

Kleine Wild Animal Subject

From out of the jungles of Central Africa comes news that the Cines company, stationed there, has just completed a big wild animal subject, using the jungle animals instead of trained beasts. People who saw "Between Savage and Tiger," the five-part Kleine subject released sometime ago, will expect something decidedly extraordinary from the jungle-imprisoned players. This company sailed for Africa last February with Anthony Novelli and other Cines "leads," in charge of Professor Fausto Salvatori.

Love Conquers Time and Ambition

Woman Gains Happiness

In the fireplace Lucile sees visions of the past.

CLEVER double exposure work, coupled with beautiful settings and convincing acting make Selig's "When a Woman's 40," to be released August 19, an appealing picture in every sense of the word. The story aims at creating sympathy for the main character, that of a woman who has passed her heyday, and succeeds admirably in its purpose, as all the situations are worked out in a natural and convincing manner.

The backgrounds selected by Director Martin about the estate which represents the home of the woman, are of California's finest variety and their possibilities have been taken full advantage of. The society atmosphere is created at the outset and is carried through the entire two reels, and the work of the scenic artists in arranging the jungle scenes is also commendable.

Miss Eugenie Besserer, who is featured in the production, does some very clever emotional work, playing both the part of a flighty young society belle and a woman, worn out by the constant strain of entertainment, simultaneously, by means of double exposure. The camera work where she sees her past life in review, as she sits by the open fire place, is very clear and gives the effect of the character looking into a mirror.

The accident in the jungle is realistically staged, the cut back system being used to good advantage in making it appear genuine. A tiger, and several elephants and camels from the Selig Zoo are called into action in this part of the story, and all handle themselves in the same manner which has made them favorites with the fans.

A rather novel introduction of characters opens the picture and the story proper begins with a reception given by Lucile Danvers, a woman who has reached the stage where the younger set no longer seeks her society. She has planned to have this event her most dazzling success, and to have the younger girls monopolize the attention of all the eligible men present is a bitter disappointment to her. Sitting alone she shows her dissatisfaction so clearly that her elder sister, seeking to comfort her, tells her that when a woman is forty she must expect such things.

Lucile, who has for twenty years been supreme in the social set, determines she is still as attractive as she formerly was and that she will not bow to the youthful charm of the debutantes. She goes to her looking glass and, while she is somewhat disappointed with herself, she refuses to admit defeat and plans to give even a larger social function at which she may regain her position as leader of her set.

Time passes and the day for the event arrives. It is to be the most elaborate affair ever given in the city and Lucile is certain of her success. Again she fails to attract the young men, however, and broken hearted she slips away alone and sits before the fireplace dreaming of her lost younger days.

Lucile entertains the poor children.

Slowly her life unfolds itself to her. She sees herself as the carefree, giddy belle whose sole ambition was to win and break the hearts of her many suitors, and then as this same girl who suddenly became filled with ambition—not the worthy kind, but ambition of the selfish variety. She wanted to excel the other society girls, to be supreme in her realm. Then she recalls the other change which came into her life, the love for the one man who was different from the rest. And then the vision of their parting creeps into her mind. She remembers how she had allowed her ambition to come between them and how, when she had refused to become his wife, he had left for India and never returned. Their love affair had taken place in an old rose garden and with his departure she had ordered it sealed and it had never been reopened.

brood over her failure in the social world. She has a different view of life now for she realizes what her ambition has cost her—a home and motherhood. Desire for love triumphs over her ambition and she determines to forsake her old life.

The dawn of the next day marks the beginning of a new life for Lucile. She devotes all her time to working in the slums and society is shocked to learn that she has stopped entertaining. Her guests now are the poor waifs of the tenements and money she formerly spent in feasting her wealthy friends is given over to paying hospital bills for poor families she locates in her many trips to the homes of the needy. A new light comes into her eyes and the look of care vanishes from her face, but she cannot dismiss the thought of the man whom twenty years before had passed from her life forever, leaving only a sweet memory.

Meanwhile in far off India Stephen Lander, the suitor whose love had been opposed by ambition, has risen to a position of wealth through sales of wild animal skins. He has all the comforts of life but he longs for the little girl he left in America. In a daring tiger hunt Stephen takes his life in his hands and the beast strikes him to the ground.

For the first time his identity becomes known and word is sent to America that he has been killed in the jungle and eventually Lucile learns of it. She knows it means the end of the fond dreams she had entertained since her awakening, that some day her lover would return, but she has seen the poorer classes suffer silently and she faces her own ordeal with bravery.

The days pass slowly and she continues her work among the afflicted and in the joy she brings to them she finds peace but not contentment. Her mind continually drifts back to the trysting place, where the man who had loved her had pleaded for her heart and been rejected, and she determines to again open the old rose garden and revisit the scene which is now the most sacred memory she possesses.

With the assistance of the old family butler she pushes aside the rusted gate, no longer able to swing on its hinges and gently steals through the heavy foliage which has grown over the spot she knows so well. As she turns to leave Stephen stands before her, his arms outstretched, for he can tell by her expression the longing which fills her heart. She goes to him and they find joy in each other's arms as he tells her of his fight with death in India and how he won and returned to America, determined to find her. And she knows that at last love has conquered time.

Ellis Joins Eclair Company

Will E. Ellis, formerly scenario editor for the Colorado Motion Picture Company, is now located at the Eclair Western studio at Tucson, Arizona, in the same capacity and is still turning out stories of the character that won for him the title of "the man who put the 'punch' in 'cowpuncher.'"

Faversham Signs With All Star

Through his personal representative, Mr. Gallagher, William Faversham, the international stage favorite, has cabled his acceptance of an offer made for his debut in motion pictures with the All Star Feature Corporation, under the direction of Augustus Thomas, director general for that concern. It has been freely rumored for many months past that Mr. Faversham had completed negotiations with various concerns and just as often has been denied that these negotiations have been successfully consummated. Since his leaving America the All Star Company has been in constant touch with Mr. Faversham by cable, and word has just been received through his representative that he has accepted and signed the contract tendered by the All Star Company. The amount to be paid Mr. Faversham for this appearance before the motion picture camera has not been disclosed, but it is known that his price is one far in excess of what has heretofore been paid to players appearing in motion pictures. It will be remembered that the All Star Company has paid Ethel Barrymore a sum exceeding $10,000 for her services and it is rumored that Mr. Faversham's contract is in excess of even this amount.

William Faversham.

The subject chosen for a vehicle for this popular star is "The World," a most complete spectacular drama, which has enjoyed, in years gone by, a phenomenal success as a theatrical attraction. The star character in this production will give Mr. Faversham every possible opportunity to display the versatilities and dramatic accomplishments for which he is famed.

On the Outside Looking In

By the Goat Man

James Young as "David Garrick."

I HAVE been in New York City just one short week, but it seems a tremendously long month. New York City is a hard town for the man who has a home and a downtown club, and an honest-to-goodness country club, with a bag full of clubs that are rusting and with all of the attending comforts. It is hard for me to get used to the difference between a regular eight-hour day, five and a half days a week, and a New York week that begins Tuesday at noon and ends Thursday at 4:22 p. m. The week-end in Gotham is a terror for the dub who has to work for a living.

* * *

But then New York has a wonderful lot of suburbs that break up the monotony. I spent a day at New Rochelle, N. Y., and another at Bayonne, N. J. I'll get around to them after a bit.

* * *

I have discovered two things that I have been suspecting for some little time, and these will be set down right away. The first seems to be the more significant: The film game is a bonanza rather than a business. Ingalls Kimball and I agreed on that after two hours of palaver over a delightful luncheon at the Lafayette.

* * *

The other we will charge up directly to Harry Aitken, for he is the responsible agent. He advertises the "movies," and the movies are here. "Movies" is the other discovery. Movies has drawn the line straight through the film offerings. It is as sharply defined as the wake of an ocean liner. Movies is program stuff—short lengths intended for the common people. It has sunk the whole gamut of single reels to a lower level and there is no hope of bringing back "motion pictures" to the every-day fan. And I am sincerely mournful. The long lengths survive the term movie. They will be known in polite circles as motion pictures, now and henceforth. Today and henceforth it will be necessary to manufacture both movies and motion pictures. Either can be features. It's the film that gets the business that is entitled to the rank of feature.

Bonanza rather than business can best be proven when one jogs about a bit. I am thinking of Charlie Hite. When I was first in Hite's town—it is actually that—he was comparatively new as a resident. It was shortly after the fire at the Thanhouser studio and "the works" was merely a makeshift, the friendly maw of an idle garage substituting for general offices and factory. The studio was a platform on a leased lot conveniently nearby. I recall an elaborate set of blue prints contemplating a splendid, ornate building with Corinthian columns and mosaic floors and a swimming pool for the help and general stores and a gold knob for the lofty flagstaff. It would be the home of Thanhouser by the time I came back, judging time by my previous visit.

* * *

It didn't turn out that way. Film men are national. Charlie Hite meant to build that great monumental pile right away, but he discovered that the immediate thing was more necessary, so he started his "little studio" back of the garage—he owned that lot! The little studio didn't have that name right away. It was wonderfully big when it was built, with a lunchroom downstairs and dressing rooms nearly everywhere and great sides, ends and roof of glass. It was built snug up to the garage, which gave up a lot of things when the buildings became one. No, the "little studio" got its name after the big one across the street had been finished.

* * *

You see, that leased lot and open-air platform had become so vital a part of Thanhouser that the little studio was merely incidental. But there was still no time to shut down the works for the elaborate blue-print scheme. So Hite dickered for and bought the platform lot and then the next and then the next and took options on the whole block and kept right on spending the money he was making all the while, building the things he had to have in a hurry. And now he has a big, homey, efficient studio and business offices on one side of his street, and the little studio and factory on the other. The platform has simply been pushed on down the campus, because you can't do business without it! I move around slowly on the theory that time isn't nearly so valuable to me as it is to those

"Our Mutual Girl" meets Daniel Frohman.

I would most care to see. It took me from eight o'clock in the morning until two in the afternoon to see Charlie Hite all by his lonesome as much as half an hour, so why should I speed up? But at that we had lunch together and I sat on the inverted end of a waste paper basket! I can put it in the record that the Thanhouser place is alive. It would be telling if I told you how much raw stock the mills ground out and where it went and there are some plans ahead that will call for more of it. There are one hundred and forty on the payroll, not counting extras. The Thanhouser plant always changes between my visits. It is one of the things that grows. I have never been there when the nail beaters weren't busy.

The big studio would have required an extravagance of time which could not be considered, measured by the forced requirements. It would also have taken a pile of money all in a heap. The money was secondary. To prove it, I went with Charlie Hite in his new Cole roadster over to see the missus and the kiddies. You may recall that Hite started into films from very unpretentious beginnings. Even in my brief day he might have loaded all his physical film assets in a wheelbarrow and made away with them single-handed. That was six years ago, come now. Well, we went to see the missus and the kiddies, as I've already mentioned. We motored down Meadow Lane to the "Million Dollar Mystery" house, which was built by Francis Wilson in his heydays. That is C. J. Hite's home—that truly imposing and magnificent mansion snugged into the trees and shrubbery of its lofty three acres. Mrs. Hite apologized for some of the missing furniture, which had been whisked out of place for the studio. "The Million Dollar Mystery" centers about the Hite home. Exteriors are made there. Interiors at the studio are replicas of the home itself, so you get on the screen just what I got at close range. The garage at the Hite home is being enlarged to take care of more cars. I got that out of the corner of my eye without asking questions.

This is stringing out to beat the band, but when you are telling a story it never ends until you finish. This new Cole roadster is Hite's very latest pet. He has turned the big limousine and the chauffeur over to Mrs. Hite. Hite won't be arrested for breaking speed laws, for he's a sworn-in deputy sheriff or something. For my own protection I carried Bert Adler's badge, which declared, without any equivocation whatever, that I was "Special Deputy Sheriff, No. 335, Bronx County, New York." It covered the period from 1914 to 1918. In addition to his present mania for speed, Hite has added a new speed boat to his ocean fleet and wears a life belt when he drives it. All these little incidents work back to my admonition of a few years ago when I warned the New Yorkers to beware of Hite, Aitken and Freuler —those western speeders who were now in their midst.

Then you will remember that Pop Rock and his crowd, and George Kleine and his, and some others were forming the habit of building or acquiring Broadway theaters. It is quite a costly diversion, but not to be outdone, Charlie Hite thought he would uphold the dignity of Thanhouser by building a little place of his own. When I was taking my leave at New Rochelle, W. Ray Johnston, treasurer of Hite's Broadway Rose Gardens, volunteered to go along and show me the rest of it.

Hite's Broadway Rose Gardens are at Fifty-third and Broadway and extend right through to Seventh avenue. You will recall that the wedge is pretty thick that far up. It is a block north of the Winter Garden and I was so flabbergasted when I saw it I forgot to ask for dimensions. But it is generous in width, and as depth counts two ways, it is all of that. The Broadway side represents a beautiful, modern motion picture theater and a lavish expenditure of money in all its appointments. The Seventh avenue side represents all that New York craves—a place to spend money on the great White Way. It is the Jardin de Danse brought down to the street level for a better class of people. There is a liberal dancing floor and promenades and loges and places to dine on balconies and on the main floor. I never saw anything quite like it and neither did you, for it is alone in its class. There are sumptuous quarters for the employes and all the conveniences for the guests. It's a quarter to get in on one side and a dollar to get out on the other, or vice versa—providing you require no refreshment enroute. When you are in New York, Hite has it planned to get you coming and going, remember that.

At the Hite Gardens I met many of the executive staff—all fine people. Hite has maintained that program all the way. But I missed Doc. Shallenberger. Dr. Wilbert Shallenberger, be it known, also of Chicago, is the lucky guy who grabbed Hite's coat tails a few years ago and never let go. Where goes Charlie Hite you will find the genial Doc.

A breathless moment in Edison's "The Mystery of the Octagonal Room."

So I tell you here is proof positive that the film game is a bonanza instead of a business. I wouldn't have it leak out that any dub might get away with it a la Charles Jackson Hite. That would be discounting all the care, the know-how, the shrewdness, the hard, incessant work that he has put into it. But other men in other lines have failed while Hite has his behind and the tide coming in. Put her into high, Steve. I've got a sheriff's medal!

* * *

Dave, you'll simply have to hold over for a week. Your story is too long.

* * *

George H. Wiley, the ex-sec. of the M. P. E. L. of A., has my undying regard for the wallop he gave to the fraternity just after laying aside his empty houses. When they come from "out of the west" they run true to form and rarely ever break in the last quarter. George Wiley worked like mad to make the Dayton convention a success. It was no fault of his that it wasn't. The exhibitors in the high grass country are peace-abiding and do all that is humanly possible to make both ends meet. They would go to conventions if conventions had anything to offer. Conventions have not reached that point yet.

These same exhibitors form the backbone of the film indnstry. They devote their whole time to their local problems. The only help they get comes usually from their own families. It isn't an uncommon thing to find the proprietor's daughter selling the tickets while her brother runs the projector. The week's profit depends largely upon the luck they have had with their program. If it was extremely bad—which is not infrequently the case, they suffer out of all proportion. The program that comes to the exhibitor is up to the exchange booker. All too often this booker has no feeling in the matter.

* * *

Eventually, when the service becomes intolerable, the country exhibitor speculates with a "feature" for Saturday. The exchange finds it out and resents such liberty. A warning is sent out that further violation will mean a larger charge for rental service.

* * *

Charley Bratton repeats the stories he has heard about Ellicott. Scene from Essanay's "A Gentleman of Leisure"

The exhibitor, in retaliation, refers to the latest quotation of another program and makes the change. For a time his service is good in proportion to the general goodness of the program. When there are no more programs to try, an offer to return again to his first love is usually met with a higher price than he was paying when he left. There is too little consideration shown the country exhibitor. His is a trying occupation. You rarely hear of one becoming opulent. He is gored from all sides. We call him a bonehead, but he is all but that. Some day he will be given a film service because of his value to the business and it won't begin with ninety-day stuff. Some day the conventions of this country will command his attention, but until then he will run his business with the help of John up in the box and Jessie out front with a National Cash Register's ticket vending machine.

There are altogether too many Johnstons in this business. There is Johnston of Eclectic, Johnston of Thanhouser, other Johnsons and Johnston of The News. My reference to a Johnston a week ago becomes terribly involved when I realize that there is too much Johnston. I was thinking of Wm. A. Johnston, a wholly likable chap with good intentions. He has formed the habit of trailing me. Somebody has told him to follow the goat. It was a bum hunch. To follow the goat means to lose money. Johnston presumes to know all about film advertising. I know nothing about it.

* * *

There is only one man who knows how to advertise films, and that man is Louis J. Selznick. He advertises elephants. Ask him how much are elephants next Thursday. See his elephant advertisements in the almanac!

A Thrilling Warner Release

"The Tragedy of Room 17" is not as startling and melodramatic a production as its name would suggest. The film is a three reel subject of the Milano brand and will be released by Warner's Features on August 10.

The title is taken from a legend connected with one of the rooms of an ancient hostelry which was often the stopping place of the nobility. The actual "tragedy of room 17" is the height to which a jealous husband's imagination soars when he hears the sound of kissing coming from his wife's room.

There is much of merit in the acting, settings, and photography in the picture, but a lot of the action in the first two reels is not concentrated enough to bear directly on the climax, which occurs in the third. The picture is one that will take with an audience, for while some of its incidents do not contribute directly to the success or failure of the main plot they contain enough dramatic action and humor to be interesting when taken separately.

In brief the story is of a baby who, at the death of its mother, is placed in a children's home by the aunt, a young girl who is engaged to a rich nobleman and who prefers to keep secret the story of the child, lest her part in the affair be misunderstood.

The children's home burns, the child falls into the hands of some wicked peasants from whom it is rescued by a detective, and is returned to its aunt at the hotel at which she is stopping on her honeymoon. In the lounging room the young nobleman meets an old resident who tells him the history connected with room 17. The romantic tale still fresh in his mind the count goes to his room which is number 17. He is startled to hear the sound of kissing coming from his wife's room across the hall. He rushes in, sees a man in the room and denounces his wife. Explanations follow, the detective is introduced, and the nobleman regrets his rashness.

Gaston Bell, Lubin Star

Gaston Bell was born in Boston, Mass., of English parents, educated in Boston and was a choir boy under Warren A. Lock of Harvard College. His first appearance on the stage was as a Spanish boy in the opera "Carmen" with Marie Tempest. He did not follow the stage until he had finished his college work and then studied the drama for two years in New York before appearing behind the footlights. His first engagement was with Daniel Frawley's stock company in the West. For twelve years after that he played many parts among which were "Little Billie" in "Trilby," an important character in "Brewster's Millions" with Edward Abeles, and in "Julie Bon Bon" with Louis Mann and Clara Lipman, the Columbia stock company in Washington and the Shubert stock company in Brooklyn, several vaudeville sketches and productions under Charles and Daniel Frohman, rounded out his experience. His last role in the legitimate was in "The Seven Sisters," under Daniel Frohman, with Charles Cherry and Laurett Taylor playing "Baron Gida." From that he went into pictures, appearing with the Majestic company, then with Marion Leonard, and later spent a year with Kinemacolor as its leading man. Nathan Hale was one of his biggest pictures at that time. He is with Lubin now, appearing in plays such as "The Third Degree."

Comedies on Warner Program

The announcement made last week that Warner's Features, Inc., is to incorporate one-reel comedies on its program has aroused considerable interest in film circles. P. A. Powers, president of the concern, in speaking of the new departure, said, "We are very busy selecting subjects for our comedy program. Genuine comedies are very rare, but will accept none that do not measure up to the high standard of our feature releases. Several studios are busy working on comedies that will meet our requirements. The old worn out themes are to be avoided and only those unusual and original in conception will be considered.

"The new films will be high class, be able to provoke real laughter and moreover will be the kind that produce business results. There is a large demand from the public and exhibitors for this kind of films, and we are confident that we will be able to more than meet the demand. When plans are completely formulated they will be released as an integral part of the Warner's program."

MEN OR WOMEN?

WHEN you cast your eye over the unbroken rows of heads that fill your field of vision from the entrance to the screen, whose presence means your prosperity, of whom do you see the more—men or women?

The question is not one of idle curiosity, nor is it for the benefit of the compiler of statistics. It is a matter vital to your greater success as an exhibitor.

For you know very well, if you stop to think about it, that the ladies are the real spenders and the real pleasure-seekers. This truth may work itself out in three different ways: The ladies may spend their own nickels and dimes, or they may persuade the men to spend theirs, or the men may spend in the hope of pleasing the ladies. But always the ladies are the prime movers, the originating cause of the expenditure. If it were not for the ladies the picture theaters would have a hard time—to say nothing of the amusement parks, the legitimate theaters and any number of varieties of retail stores.

Since the ladies we have always with us, thanks to an all-wise Providence, there may appear to be little to worry over in this condition of human nature. But the fact is, it makes considerable difference in the amount of business you do whether you run contrary to the laws of nature or with them. If the ladies are responsible for most of your business, it will pay you to make your show attractive to the ladies. And if you find that men are the greater patrons of your theater, it is merely evidence that you are not attracting the most remunerative and the fastest growing patronage. Then it is up to you to change your program to attract the ladies.

Men and women enjoy good drama in the same way, and to a lesser degree, good comedy. Woman's sense of comedy is not quite the same as man's. And certainly woman's sense of propriety and impropriety in pictures is different from man's.

Take the problems of censorship. It is undeniable that the mere fact that a film has been censored—that is, has been either rejected or cut—makes it a desirable thing to see, from the man's viewpoint. The more it needs censoring the more the average man wants to see it. It acquires a mysterious attractive force, like one of those paper-covered "French novels" that are sold in a sealed package with a whisper, and whose seal is their only mystery.

Now, a woman's curiosity is possibly greater, but undoubtedly different. The normal woman would not care anything about seeing the cutouts of a censored film. She may accept a risque subject if its story is interesting, but not otherwise, and at no time will she go out of her way to see it because it is risque. The average woman—and we must judge by averages—wants motion pictures a little more delicate, a little cleaner, a little more sentimental, than the average man cares for.

Most exhibitors are men, and judge by a man's standards. But if both exhibitors and manufacturers could get the vote of the feminine population on the kind of pictures desired, and would follow the evidence, all censor boards would die a natural death and the picture theater would be even more popular an institution than it is.

THE FEATURE WRITER.

IT SEEMS but a few months ago that the man or woman who was engaged in writing single reel photoplays at the rate of one or two a week scorned the idea of spending any more time on the product of his or her brain than was absolutely necessary for its mechanical preparation. How different are conditions now.

The time formerly required to complete a short-length script is, in many cases, spent in drafting a single character or carefully planning a situation for a more pretentious offering and as a result the quantity of production from the brains of the scenario writers has been greatly cut down, but the quality has greatly improved. There are, and always will be, many people who are capable of doing excellent work on scenarios for one and two-reel productions who cannot do justice to themselves in preparing a longer script. However, with the advent of feature films and the wide attention they attracted, many of the writers, both free lance and staff, left their original field to try their hand at the "big stuff."

Many of them found that their talents were especially adapted to this style of script and have given up all other writing to devote their entire attention to features. Others discovered that they were in a field foreign to them. Some of the latter studied the conditions which surrounded them and learned "what was what", they went ahead and made good; many more, however, returned to the one-reel stories.

To those who have succeeded in making good in this feature field the future is promising. It seems inevitable that the division of the feature and the short length must come, and when it does the big story with a gripping plot behind it which will hold the attention from start to finish without resorting to padding, will be regarded as an equal of the legitimate drama. To the "men below" the single and double reel subjects will continue to offer a field which should prove lucrative to many having fictional powers but lacking in literary style, and to those who do not feel justified in devoting their time to features.

NEW COLORED FILM STOCK.

The Gevaert Company of Belgium is marketing in this country through the Raw Film Supply Company, 15 East 26th street, New York City, a new product which will undoubtedly be of vital interest to the motion picture industry.

The stock in question is standard positive emulsion, coated on a colored base which eliminates the necessity of tinting with aniline colors which has been in vogue for several years and which not only required additional apparatus and labor but had many drawbacks as well. The principle objection to tinting, however, has been the fact that the dye or stain did not take evenly throughout the film and oftentimes trouble was caused by excessive densitive color on those parts of the film resting on the bottom of the finishing or drying frames.

To eliminate these disagreeable features the Gevaert Company, after experimenting a number of years, finally succeeded in arranging for the exclusive use of the Silvio Cocanart's patent for a colored base. The colors are absolutely fast to light and are handled identically the same as ordinary stock.

At the present time it can be obtained in light and dark red, pale and light blue, orange, yellow, light and verde green, mauve and pale violet, rose and pink.

The price of this distinctive stock is practically the same as the ordinary, and the Raw Film Supply Company will gladly send samples, etc., to any reader of this publication making inquiry for same.

Pal Haase slipped us a card this morning that he collected somewhere in his travels, which purports (some word, eh?) to introduce Lloyd Robinson, but the card bears across its face that strange device "Llyod Robinson." Whatsmatter Lloyd, too busy to read proof on the printer or do you want us to suspect you of being a Welsher?

This week, while the Goat's away, strikes us as being as good a time as any to spring a little surprise we have been arranging for some time. To the left you'll behold the only and original photograph of the Goat in the role of the Boy Bicyclist, while the style of the "wheel" and the costume worn by the rider will easily fix the date of the picture as midway between the Civil and the Spanish-American wars. Alone and unassisted, the Goat peddled the bike many, many miles across "the sandy plains of Nebrasky," winning numerous medals and breaking several records en route. We expect to get killed when the Goat sees this stuff (honest, we're not his press agent), but hope to be away when he lamps it and perchance (again we repeat perchance) he'll have forgiven us by the time we get back from that vacation of our'n.

Old Sweethearts Eventually United

Charming Ingenue Appears

Oren calls to escort Dorothy home from school.

IF the styles of the present day were not a revival of the styles of decades ago, thus making it perfectly proper for pretty Miss Preston, the boarding house keeper, to appear in her mother's wedding gown; if Oren Evans' bewitching daughter had not taken such a fancy to Miss Preston, her father's one-time sweetheart, and insisted upon her attending the picnic party arranged for her boarders; if the squall had not arisen and fear for the safety of Evans had not sent Miss Preston hurrying forth to summon aid for Evans, whom she believed far out at sea in a small boat, this story would never have been written.

Preparing for the picnic spread.

As it happens, however, all of the above interesting events took place at just the proper instant and the whole is convincingly and prettily told in a two-reel feature film entitled "At the End of a Perfect Day," to be released by the American Film Manufacturing Company on Monday, August 3.

Winnifred Greenwood is featured in the role of Dorothy Preston and never has she so completely changed her identity as she does in the portion of the picture in which she appears as the boarding house keeper. It all seems to have been done by a different arrangement of the hair, but Miss Greenwood is to be congratulated upon her success in so sinking her identity in the character she is creating that even her most ardent admirers will have difficulty in recognizing her.

Edward Coxen is "Oren Evans," the hero of the tale, and George Field appears as "Stid Butterfield," Coxen's rival for the heroine's hand. Other American favorites are cast in numerous minor roles, where they appear to advantage, but particular mention should be made of the young lady who is seen as the daughter of Evans in the latter portion of the picture. She is bright, vivacious, pretty as a picture, and registers perfectly every emotion she is called upon to display. Her name does not appear on the cast sheet, but this reviewer has no hesitancy in saying that she is one of the cleverest ingenues the public has had the pleasure of seeing on the screen in many months, and the prediction is made that she will be heard from in a big way as time goes on.

As the story opens we behold Dorothy Preston, the village school teacher, being met and escorted home by Oren Evans, with whom she is in love. Oren proposes, but Dorothy refuses him because she believes it her duty to devote her life to her mother, who is in poor health. Stid Butterfield, Oren's rival, suggests to Evans that it is not altogether love for her mother which led Dorothy to refuse him, hinting instead that it is love for him. Though Oren does not for a moment believe that such is the case, he is so badly upset by the girl's refusal that he decides to go west.

Dorothy learns with surprise that her mother has been looking forward to her marriage with Oren, and for that very purpose has preserved her wedding dress of a fashion of long ago. Hurriedly Dorothy prepares a note for Oren and asks Stid, who calls, to deliver it to him before he departs. Stid smiles craftily to himself and makes no effort to deliver the message, so Oren departs without knowing it.

Months later Oren writes Dorothy suggesting that he will come back if the girl but speaks the word. He encloses a self-addressed envelope for a reply. Mrs. Preston, Dorothy's mother, gets the letter, but not having her glasses handy cannot read it, so again Stid Butterfield has an opportunity to overwhelm his rival. He reads the letter for Dorothy's mains behind, and there Oren's daughter finds her address, so that, later, when Dorothy herself receives Oren's note, she is ignorant of his address and cannot reply.

Stid then presses his hopeless claim upon Dorothy and when the girl refuses him he threatens to have his father, who is chairman of the school board, discharge her. True to his promise, Stid sends his father to separate Dorothy from her position. At this time Mrs. Preston is taken desperately ill, and the girl, badly needing her salary to provide the dainties which her mother needs, agrees to marry Stid if her position is restored to her.

On her deathbed, Mrs. Preston discovers Stid's engagement ring on Dorothy's finger and takes it off. The mother dies and Dorothy tells Stid that her mother's answer to his proposal must be hers. Soon after the funeral Dorothy receives a letter from the West and upon opening it discovers it to be the announcement of the birth of a baby girl to Oren, who has married after failing to get an answer from Dorothy to his former letter.

Fifteen years later Dorothy has surrendered to circumstances and imagines that she is an old woman. For years she has been keeping boarders as a means of livelihood and the many cares and troubles of a boarding house keeper have severely told upon her. Her hair is arranged with extreme plainness and her gowns are surprisingly simple.

Accordingly when Oren, now a widower, arrives with his fifteen-year-old daughter he is much surprised at the appearance of his former sweetheart and falls an easy victim to Miss Everlyn, a boarder at Dorothy's, who has determined to win the heart and hand of the good-looking widower, whom she knows to be a man of wealth.

Oren's daughter sincerely loves Dorothy, after whom she has been named, and grasping the situation, decides to do everything in her power to foster a match between her father and his former sweetheart. Dorothy is much distressed over Oren's attentions to Miss Everlyn, though she keeps her thoughts to herself. Alone in the solitude of her room, she prays for one perfect day in her life—a day in which she may enjoy everything that she has missed through all the long years passed.

The perfect day dawns with a resolution to provide an outing for her boarders at the seaside and the happy company are sent away in buckboards to eat a picnic luncheon on the beach. Dorothy herself remains behind, and there Oren's daughter finds her late in the afternoon, and insists upon her joining the merrymakers on the beach. dress by Oren's daughter, and more bewitching than any of her boarders when becomingly dressed—for the old style is now in the height of fashion—she goes forth to join the others.

Oren is overwhelmed by her beauty—for to him she now appears like the girl with whom he had once been in love, though the catty remarks of some of the boarders nearly succeed in spoiling the day for both Oren and Dorothy. A squall comes up and Dorothy is much worried over Oren, whom she had last seen far out at sea in a tiny boat. Fearing for his safety she leaves her dripping guests at home and goes to summon help for the man she loves. Oren has meanwhile returned and learning that Dorothy has gone forth to aid him he hurries after her, finds her on the beach in tears, and finally comes to a perfect understanding with her. Ere the sun sets that evening the little boarding house keeper has found love and contentment, thus bringing to an end her perfect day.

The cast in part is as follows:

Dorothy Preston .....Winnifred Greenwood
Oren Evans, her lover.....Ed. Coxen
Stid Butterfield, his rival.....George Field
Mrs. Preston, Dorothy's Mother.....Josephine Ditt
Miss Everlyn, a boarder.....Edith Borella
Squire Butterfield, Stid's father.....John Steppling

"Cabiria" Starts Southern Tour

Two camels, and the most complete equipment ever assembled for the exhibition of a screen production on the road will be transported from city to city in two private cars. Frank Rogers, who recently secured exhibition rights for the southern states, will personally conduct the party, and will have as his chief assistant Cecil Wood, projection expert of the Atsco Company.

All details connected with the equipment of the company were looked after by the Atsco Company, even to making arrangements with the electric light companies to secure D. C. service at each of the stops. A radium gold fibre screen will be used.

Gossip Injures Stranger's Character

Wrongs Finally Righted

A SMALL town story of gossip, scandal and misunderstanding is the underlying theme of Essanay's two reel feature, "A Gentleman of Leisure," scheduled for release on Friday, August 14.

In it appear such popular favorites as Richard C. Travers, Bryant Washburn, and Beverly Bayne, while playing minor roles are several players new to Essanay screen subjects, but who all seem fully capable of handling the roles assigned them and who, as time goes on, will undoubtedly attract a following.

The photography is fully up to the Essanay standard and one particularly clever bit of work is done in the scene in which Travers, as Smith Ellicott, is seen carrying a candle in the cellar of the Fraser home, while seeking to force an exit from the place in which he is confined. The illusion of the light emanating from the candle is perfect.

Smith Ellicott is locked up in the cellar.

The picture is laid in and about the little hamlet of Waverly where for three months Smith Ellicott has lived without disclosing to the natives his means of livelihood or anything relating to his past. The fact that he is frequently seen in conversation with "old man Weaver," a suspected murderer, brings criticism down upon him, and numerous stories reflecting upon his honesty and station in life are afloat in the village.

Despite the mystery which seems to surround the young man he is loved by Dolly Fraser, a belle of Waverly, much to the disgust of Charley Bratton, one of her ardent admirers and the village Beau Brummel. Charley repeatedly makes it his business to warn Dolly against Ellicott, telling her that he is far beneath her station in life and hinting that the village as a whole regards him as a ne'er do well, but Dolly remains loyal to the young man who has paid her attention and sends Charley Bratton away in anything but a contented state of mind.

A day or two later, while Bratton is hunting in the woods which adjoin the village, he sees Ellicott give "old man Weaver" some money and immediately hastens to Dolly with the information that Ellicott is having transactions with a suspected criminal. Again Dolly refuses to be convinced of Ellicott's wrong doing, though she agrees to permit Charley to tell Ellicott that she thinks he owes her an explanation of his conduct, thus setting at rest the rumors which are afloat.

Bratton hastens off to find Ellicott and instead of giving him the message which Dolly had sent him to deliver, tells Ellicott that Miss Fraser no longer desires to receive his attentions. This news deeply injures Ellicott and he is on the point of going to Dolly's home to seek a further explanation of her strange request, when Phyliss, Dolly's sister, appears and demands that Ellicott play a set or two of tennis with her.

Reluctantly Ellicott goes to the tennis courts with Phyliss and when their game is finished accompanies her on a stroll through the woods. They chance upon a bird's nest and Ellicott helps Phyliss to climb a tree from which she can obtain a better view of the tiny birds in their lofty nest. Suddenly remembering that he has an engagement, Ellicott apologizes to Phyliss for leaving her so abruptly and hurries away to meet the party with whom he had previously arranged a meeting.

Meanwhile Charley Bratton has seen Ellicott and Phyliss strolling off in the direction of the woods, and when he, later, beholds a couple of tramps making their way down the woodland roadway, he suddenly conceives a plan to bring Ellicott into further disrepute. Hastening to overtake the tramps, he offers them a few dollars to kidnap Phyliss and waylay Ellicott, his scheme being to put both out of the way for the time being and then spread the story that Ellicott has abducted Phyliss.

The tramps accept Charley's money and instantly start on their mission. Phyliss is easily captured when she descends from the tree in which she had been left by Ellicott, while Ellicott himself is ambushed and beaten while he is making his way through a particularly lonely stretch of woodland. The tramp who overpowered Phyliss takes her to a lonely hut in the woods and plans to lock her within, while the other hobo leaves Ellicott stunned and injured in the roadway and hastens back to report the success of his mission to Bratton.

Suddenly "old man Weaver," who lives nearby, chances to pass the deserted hut and hears Phyliss' cries for help. He hurries in and rescues her from the clutches of the kidnapper, bearing her to his own cabin in the woods where he insists that she rest and recover from the shock she has sustained, his plan being to escort her home that evening.

Mr. and Mrs. Fraser, as well as Dolly, have, meanwhile, begun to worry over the continued absence of Phyliss and when Charley Bratton appears upon the scene and tells how he has seen Ellicott and Phyliss strolling off toward the woods, the girl's parents become highly excited. The angry father calls upon the sheriff to organize a searching party and there is much excitement about the Fraser home.

Meanwhile Ellicott has recovered partially from the attack made upon him, and unsteadily he rises to his feet and makes his way slowly back to the village, unaware that his face is bloody and his clothing torn and dirty. Passing the Fraser home, he is sighted by some who have gathered outside the house and hurried in to face the sheriff and angry Mr. Fraser. His story of the tramp's attack is not believed and the sheriff greatly fears that the mob which has gathered without the house will wreak their vengeance upon Ellicott if he is taken through their midst. Accordingly, the sheriff and Mr. Fraser lead the prisoner out through a back door and imprison him in the cellar of the Fraser mansion. Then a searching party hastens into the woods to find Phyliss.

Charley Bratton has learned Ellicott's whereabouts however and telephones a friend to tip off the mob where the prisoner is confined. A second mob then sets out to wreak vengeance upon Ellicott. Hearing the angry murmur of the approaching mob, Dolly realizes that Ellicott's life is in danger and she hastens to the cellar to release him, but is too late to be of help. She passes him an axe however with which he breaks down the door, and when the mob appears, she bravely stands before the door and explains that the prisoner has escaped. The mob immediately departs in search of him.

The sheriff's party in the woods come upon "old man Weaver" and he takes them to his cabin and restores Phyliss, now fully recovered from her fright, to her parent. Then he escorts the party to the lonely cabin where he takes up the flooring and discloses the tramp whom he had overpowered some hours before. Badly frightened, this man, seeing Bratton in the sheriff's party, denounces him as the cause of the whole plot and Phyliss is able to prove that Ellicott had nothing to do with her abduction. Bratton, thoroughly disgraced, slinks away, and the party returns to the Fraser home, where Ellicott tells them that he has bought from "old man Weaver" a plot of ground containing a new mineral substitute for putty, which seems likely to make both immensely wealthy, thus clearing up all the mystery which has surrounded him. As the picture closes it is easy to imagine that Dolly and Ellicott will later be united in marriage and "live happily ever afterward."

The cast is as follows:

Smith Ellicott	Richard C. Travers
Charley Bratton	Bryant Washburn
"Old Man Weaver"	H. B. Forgan
Bratton, Sr.	Frank Dayton
Dolly Fraser	Beverly Bayne
Phyliss, Dolly's sister	Anna Robinson

Exhibitors are warned that the American rights, including copyright, for the Cines four-part feature, "The Golden Beetle," are held by George Kleine, 166 North State street, Chicago. It is reported that a spurious copy of this film is in circulation in the United States and being offered to exhibitors.

GEORGES BAUD, soon to be introduced to American picture fans as leading man in George Kleine's "Vendetta," is a popular member of the famous vaudeville organization at the metropolitan temple of Thespis and an actor of splendid ability and international reputation. On the continent his name alone is enough to fill a theater. Every Parisian theater-goer knows his Theater du Vaudeville, and to be a member of the talented company playing at the great temple is proof that an actor is of sterling quality. Therefore it is no small evidence of the growing demands of motion picture patrons when one of the vaudeville company is called upon to add prestige to the drama of the film. M. Baud is a man of splendid physique and mobile feature, equally at home in a romantic rode or a part calling for more deft and sympathetic treatment.

Georges Baud.

MONSIEUR DUARD is one of the few European motion picture actors who can claim the distinction of being a baseball fan. During the recent visit of the White Sox-Giants combination to the continent M. Duard became acquainted with the great American game as it is played upon the western hemisphere and immediately became an enthusiast. He saw several of the games played in the various cities visited by the big league stars, purchased a book of rules and made a thorough study of the pastime. He claims he is now willing to back his knowledge of "inside baseball" against that of any dyed-in-the-wool fan in America. M. Duard's interest in baseball, however, does not interfere with his serious work in motion pictures. He has scored many successes in his varied screen career, but looks upon his work in recent Kleine releases as his best.

REGINA BADET, long a favorite with the amusement-loving populace of Paris and one of the stars of the world-famous Opera Comique in the French capital, is among the latest of the talented artists who have deserted the speaking stage for the silent drama. Mme. Badet was persuaded to carry the leading role in George Kleine's five-part film adaptation of Marie Corelli's famous novel, "Vendetta," and so delighted is she with her splendid success in that production that she promises to devote much of her time hereafter to acting for the screen. In "Vendetta" Mme. Badet plays the role of Nina Romani, the false wife and heartless mother of the gripping Corelli story, and her grace and charm contribute liberally to the splendid effect of the pictured version. She is admirably fitted by Nature to "look the part."

CHARLES ANGELO, one of the players who appeared in "Vendetta," often recalls his long experience on the dramatic stage which laid the foundations of his success as a motion picture actor. He now divides his time between appearances with the stock company at the Theater de la Porte Saint-Marin and performances before the camera. He is an athletic young man of striking appearance and great personal charm, and is celebrated in Paris as a "matinee idol" of considerable magnetism. M. Angelo is an accomplished linguist and speaks several languages fluently. He is an expert horseman and swimmer, as well as a swordsman of reputation and a crack shot. Athletic sports of various kinds are his favorite recreations, although he likes also to dabble in art and is himself a painter of no mean ability. This last accomplishment often proves useful to him.

Mary Fuller a Real Heroine

Something is always "happening to Mary." The latest thrill to be added to Mary Fuller's life is a battle with a snake, in which said snake met his Waterloo. With Director Walter Edwin and a company of some thirty-five players the star who recently joined the Universal is up in Blue Ridge mountains, Shohola, Pike County, Pa., putting on a three reel feature, "The Heart of the Night Winds." The hotel people were certain that there hadn't been a snake seen in the "crick," which comes down from the big falls at Shohola, for twenty years, so Mary decided to go in wading. But when she pulled off her white stockings and little black shoes and began to "sozzle" her pink toes around in the water, a big water moccasin lifted its head from the moss across the stream and, slipping into the water, quickly swam to pay his respects to "our movie heroine." Mary didn't shriek or run, or anything like that but instead grasped a hickory stick and waited. "I'll spank you, naughty snake," she warned. The "villain" was not easily frightened, however, and with blood in his eye he darted at her leg. After a series of terific "whacks," the big mottled black lay still.

A Roman Costume Drama

One of the late feature releases of the Eclectic Company is "When Rome Ruled," a five-part drama of the days of the Christian persecution. The picture is American made, but the exteriors, cave scenes, costumes, temples and amphitheater are all in such strict accordance with the history of this period that one can easily imagine the picture as being taken in the land in which the story is laid.

An able cast of Pathe players is seen in the leading roles supported by an unusually well-trained group of extras. With one exception the interpretation of the different roles is well done. The fault of the exception is overacting, but as the part is not a vital one it does not detract from the value or interest of the picture. Great pains have been taken in the arrangement and construction of the settings, which are big and solid looking.

The story is of a Christian girl, Nydia, whom one of the Roman high priests wishes as one of the vestal virgins because of her virtue and beauty. The rascally high priest continually persecutes Nydia, several times attempting to take her by force. Caius, the son of the Roman governor, is attracted by Nydia's beauty and foils the high priest's frequent attempts to abduct her. At the death of her father, Caius decides to marry Nydia, but is greatly opposed by his father, who insists that his son marry the girl of his choice. Nydia is seized and thrown into the arena of the amphitheater. The jealous chosen bride informs Caius of his Christian sweetheart's fate, and he rushes to the rescue. As he enters the arena she slams the door and rejoices in her revenge, when she discovers that her gown is caught. She opens the door to release it, is pulled in by Caius, and the lovers escape leaving her to the mercy of the lions.

Submarine Films Shown to Public

Residents of New Rochelle, N. Y., were accorded the first public exhibition last Thursday of the under water pictures recently shown to the Smithsonian Institute and the National Press Club at Washington. More than three hundred prominent people responded to the invitation extended to them by Charles J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Company, and were delighted by the thrilling under water scenes of a man battling with sharks and the sharks battling among themselves which were thrown on the screen at the North American Theater of that city. Old wrecks hidden beneath the waters are also shown in this series of pictures which will make their initial appearance in New York City at the Broadway Rose Gar-

Police Dog Turns Thief

A decidedly new state of affairs in regard to the use of dogs in criminal matters is shown in Chapter 30 of "Our Mutual Girl," written by Irvin S. Cobb. It shows how a police dog, trained in the various methods of crooks and knowing all the tricks of the guardians of the law, can easily be made to serve a criminal by forcing it to steal its food for some time. Anni, the canine used in this film, was formerly a Berlin police dog, but because of her high strung temperament could not get along with the other dogs and was shipped to this country. Arthur James, editor of "Our Mutual Girl" series, heard of the wonderful little creature, who during her service with the police was one of the cleverest they possessed, and together with Mr. Cobb, planned to try the experiment. The scene in which she plays crook requires her hiding under a bed, stealing out after Margaret, "Our Mutual Girl," has retired, taking the necklace and escaping before she can be captured. The little dog acts her part without a mistake and the end of the reel shows her running with her master, who is responsible for her criminal career, away from the scene of the robbery.

Figman and Robertson Score Hit

Lasky Feature Praised

THE Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company can justly feel proud of its latest release, "The Man on the Box." It is in five parts and replete with powerful situations, thrilling incidents, realistic scenes, and pure, unadulterated humor. Taken altogether it is far out of the beaten path of the ordinary and conventional.

The story is so well balanced, and the climaxes and humor so evenly distributed that while one is kept in almost continuous laughter by Max Figman's ludicrous attempts to become a proficient butler he is not, for a moment, allowed to lose the impression that underneath it all there is a strong current of romance and drama which, in the last reel, comes to the surface, ending in a natural and complete finish.

The scenes and photography are good throughout the picture. Their greatest common asset is in the first reel where we see, from an advantageous position in the mountains, the Indians attacking the supply train in the valley far below, and in another scene where the cavalry charges right across before the camera. The interiors lack nothing in the detail that could give them a further air of fineness and completeness.

Max Figman is irresistible in the titular role, that of Lieutenant Bob Warburton. The prominent place he occupies in the limelight is his by right, for whether the gesture or scene be comic or dramatic Mr. Figman's interpretation portrays it to its best advantage. Lolita Robertson as the tall, graceful Betty Annesley is a noble-spirited type of girl whose patience with the bungling butler is a thing at which to marvel. Harry Fisher plays the true "friend in need" in the role of Chuck Henderson. The dignified, courteous Colonel Annesley is well characterized by James Neill. J. W. Johnson as Count Karloff is a man of stately bearing and unprincipled character whose schemes very nearly shatter the honor of the Annesley family. The role of the sturdy Colonel Raleigh is well played by Fred Montague. Col. C. F. Le None as the scout; Fred L. Wilson as Jack Warburton; Betty Jonson and Mabel Van Buren as the Misses Nancy and Kit Warburton; and H. B. Carpenter as the Russian ambassador complete the large and able cast. The types selected fit their parts remarkably well. The picture was staged under the direction of Messrs. De Mille and Apfel.

In appreciation of his bravery in the Indian wars Lieutenant Bob Warburton is granted a furlough and returns home. After a short visit he goes to Europe and while there sees an American girl with whom he immediately falls in love. They return on the same boat and Bob tries several times to secure an introduction to her but is unsuccessful.

The Warburton girls receive an invitation to a formal reception and ask Bob to accompany them, but he refuses. Betty Annesley and a girl friend attend the function, partly because Betty is anxious to meet the gallant "Brother Bob" about whom the Warburton girls have told her so much. Meanwhile Bob plans a joke to play on his sisters, secures a footman's livery, shaves off his beard and changes places with their coachman. In taking the call slip Bob reads the number inverted. It reads 19, but really is 61. When number 19 is called Bob drives up, notices that two girls enter, and, thinking them his sisters, starts away at breakneck speed.

He drives home, opens the carriage door, and kisses the young woman who steps out. To his amazement it is the girl whom he had seen in Europe. She has him arrested and the next day appears in court against him. Bob notifies his friend, Chuck Henderson, to come and pay his fine and while waiting receives a note from Betty offering him a position as hired man if he will promise to swear off drinking.

He accepts the position and is instructed in his duties as butler. His first experience in waiting at the table is at a dinner at which both his sisters are present. Because of the absence of his beard they do not recognize him. One of the guests Bob dislikes, a foreigner named Count Karloff. As he is about to pour soup down his back Betty's warning glance stops him, but does not in any way lessen his dislike towards the fellow.

Count Karloff learns that Colonel Annesley is hard pressed for money and offers him a large sum, besides cancelling a note of his which he holds, if Annesley will work out for him the plans of the government's coast defense. The colonel agrees for Betty's sake and sets about drawing the plans.

The Warburton girls' anxiety at Bob's absence is quieted by receiving a letter from him stating that he has gone north to hunt big game. While visiting them one day Betty is shown Bob's picture in the album. Immediately she recognizes him as her butler. On returning home she discovers her father and Count Karloff in serious conference. She is called into the room and the count proposes to her but she refuses him. In the meantime the butler has entered the room. Some days before he discovered that the colonel had drawn a sketch of the coast defense, and now when he sees it in the count's hand he takes it from him, gives him back his money and note and shows the angry foreigner out.

The next day Colonel Annesley receives the note perforated and stamped "Paid" by the bank. Though there is no way of making sure Betty is positive that it is Bob who paid the note.

That day while out riding with him she dismounts beside the road. Thinking this a good chance to press his suit Bob makes known his love, but receives no encouragement. As he turns away she calls him by his right name. Astonished, Bob turns and asks how she learned his identity. She explains and confesses that she loves him and had refused just to try his sincerity. There beside the road the erstwhile butler and his employer make love and discuss the queer circumstances which brought them together.

"Money" First Keanograph

Of timely interest now, with currency problems, socialistic questions, etc., actively fermenting, is the first production of the United Keanograph Film Company of Fairfax, California. "Money" is its title. Its length is six reels.

In selecting a subject for his premiere production, James Keane, president and general manager of the company, and incidentally author of the scenario and the picture's producer, gave hard and long thought. He wanted a subject near to the heart of every man. Money, something everybody wants, was the result.

Financial, political, social and economical questions existant today form the background of the story. Through this sturdy, stern material runs the woof of the love story. That public opinion, after all, is the bludgeon which batters down the evil, either within or without the law, is the point proven in this story. Here we have a man so rich as to laugh at the idea of downfall. The New York newspapers get after him, the people begin to learn and to think, and the man who thought himself invincible goes down.

Striking scenes include the destruction of the Palace of Croesus, the dynamiting of the Maxime Steel Works, the wreck of the yacht Chispa, and the great riot at the million-dollar dinner.

An All Exterior Drama

The Thanhouser-Princess single reel romance, "The Target of Destiny," is to be released on July 31. One of the features of the picture is that it does not contain any interior scenes, nature furnishing the background in the form of woods, streams, rustic bridges, and stretches of cleared, grass-covered land. The entire lack of stage-settings gives the picture a free, unconventional atmosphere that is pleasing, and harmonizes perfectly with the romantic spirit of the story.

The charm of the production lies in its arrangement and presentation. The plot is not exceptionally deep, but the situations are so arranged and handled that they "put over" their meaning without the aid of explanatory sub-titles, and when, in the last scene, the parents who had formerly bitterly opposed their son's engagement to a poor country girl now gladly consent, it comes as a perfectly natural and fitting ending. Taken altogether the picture has an air of wholesomeness and completeness that would appeal to any audience.

The cast is composed of Muriel Ostriche as the pretty country girl; Boyd Marshall as the rich man's son; Morgan Jones as the wealthy city man; Mrs. Ellery as his wife, and Baby Stewart as the little daughter. Philip Lonergan wrote and arranged the scenario, which was produced by Director Ellery. The photography is beautiful, soft and shaded in the woods scenes and wonderfully clear in its distant views.

John Bunny, who has endeared himself to countless thousands of screen followers, is soon to desert the picture game and make a tour of the world at the head of his own company of variety actors. L. C. Wiswell and George Sidney, the men who are responsible for the trip, have arranged with the Vitagraph Company for its star's unlimited leave of absence. The exact date for the beginning is not announced.

Man's Hate Conquered by Love for Flag

"Lion of Venice"

PERFECT in every detail of staging and costuming, George Kleine's six-part subject, "The Lion of Venice," is a picture with educational value which closely approaches its dramatic worth, and that is saying a great deal, as the plot is filled with gripping situations and the character portrayal is exceedingly strong.

It is a tale of a man and his country and tells how, after he has been exiled, he returns to conquer his fatherland only to find it in need of his assistance and to go to its aid. The "Lion of Venice" is the popular name for the Venetian flag and the scene in which the exile's sister hoists it above the pirate ship he command is thrilling in the extreme.

The settings are marvelous in their beauty, the Grand Canal of Venice being the background for many of the most thrilling scenes of the picture. This canal, which corresponds to the main business street of our cities, was closed one entire day to allow the Photo Drama Company to secure the correct atmosphere of the sixteenth century without having the jarring effect of vessels of modern build appearing in the background. This fact alone makes the picture one of decided importance as it is probably the first time in the history of pictures that such a favor has been granted a film producing company.

A large number of players appear in the latter part of the production and are handled in the usual masterful manner which characterizes the methods of foreign directors. The acting throughout is artistic, the cast being well balanced and all the players grasping every opportunity afforded them. Perhaps the most appealing scene in the entire play is the one where Benito and his sister are passing away from Venice toward the open sea. Benito, who has been exiled, rises in the boat and is about to curse his fatherland, but his sister stops him and he struggles with his emotions as the shore line slowly fades in the distance.

The story opens with Benito Rienzi, a naval officer, fighting on the waters of a foreign power. Adriana, his sister, and Marina, his sweetheart, await his return anxiously and pass away the time by making a flag for him to fly over one of the ships which he commands. Count Orsini and a friend, both of whom are of the low type of men, see the two girls and are attracted by them, the count using his influence as a member of the Council of Ten, which controls the city of Venice, to force his attentions upon Marina. His friend is not so lucky with Adriana, however, but despite his many rebuffs he continues to offer his attentions to her.

Count Orsini finally forces Marina's father to consent to his marriage to the girl and elaborate plans are made for the ceremony. Benito is on his way back to Venice, after having been victorious in the battles he fought, and looks forward with great pleasure to the meeting with his family and his sweetheart.

The day of the wedding is at hand and again Adriana is bothered by the insistent friend of the groom. Just as the ceremony has been performed, Benito and his crew of victorious men arrive in the city and go at once to the Doge to report their triumph. When he finally reaches home Benito learns what has happened to his sweetheart and is heartbroken. The moment they are alone Marina tells Count Orsini that she will be true to her promise and be his wife in name, but nothing more.

Benito succeeds in reaching Marina and the lovers say farewell for the last time. The count learns of their meeting and his anger is supreme. His friend again tries to see Adriana, but Benito protects his sister and the worthless fellow tells Orsini of the interference. The two plot the downfall of the man they both hate and finally succeed in "planting" evidence in Benito's home which makes him appear a traitor to his country. He is arrested and brought before the Council of Ten, in which Orsini sits. His plea of innocence is scorned and he is condemned to death. His mother hears of her son's disgrace and, as the shock breaks her heart, she dies. Adriana appeals to the wife of the Doge to save her brother, and the good woman uses her influence with her husband to against Venice. In his native land he is branded as a traitor and a price placed upon his head. Marina, unable to listen to the defacement of her lover's name, sends him the flag of the "Lion of Venice," which was made while waiting for him to return from war before her marriage.

The wronged man, however, refuses to be influenced even by his tender feelings toward the woman who made the flag and throws the emblem of his land to the deck of the ship he commands. His sister picks it up and grieves that her brother should be so bitter against his native country.

Meanwhile the Turks attack the Venetian vessels, and though the latter fight gamely they are greatly outclassed in strength and numbers and are slowly falling before the invaders. Their ship runs ashore and the Turks plan to plunder it. They ask the pirates to join them in the sport and Benito gladly agrees. Adriana decides to try a desperate plan to save her brother from fighting against his own country, and, mounting to the topmast of the ship, she unfolds the "Lion of Venice" to the breeze and the men below are forced by their dormant patriotism to bow before it.

Instead of helping the Turks slaughter the Venetians, who are commanded by Count Orsini, Benito and the pirates defend the distressed sailors and the tide of the battle turns against the Turkish forces. In the battle Orsini is fatally wounded and is saved from a horrible death by the timely arrival of Benito. He passes away before the last shot of the battle has been fired, but not before he has confessed the plot that caused Benito to be wronged and received the forgiveness of the honorable man. His friend also shows that he is truly penitent and Adriana forgives him for his part in the foul plan.

And with the realization of his character by his countrymen, Benito returns to his native land and there, under the "Lion of Venice," he claims Marina as his bride.

Story of Court Life

Clever double exposure photography and a well complicated story form the foundation of "A Royal Imposter," a five-part feature lately released by the Eclectic Company.

It is a strong drama of royal life in a small principality. The scenes are beautifully colored by the Eclectic natural color process; the colors standing out brilliantly and the effect being deep and rich.

One of the cast plays the dual role of a young prince and his man servant. In one of the scenes the prince strikes his servant, apparently, but in reality it is only in the effect which is obtained by shifting the positions of the players. In cases where it is necessary for the prince and his servant to come in actual contact the substitution of one of the characters is made so cleverly as to be unsuspected.

Young Prince Ludwig of Gravania, a wild and reckless sort, meets a peasant girl, is attracted by her beauty, and makes love to her, but is repulsed. He orders his man servant, who greatly resembles him, to kidnap the girl. When Enrico, the servant, hears her description he realizes that it is his own sweetheart. In anger he kills the prince.

To keep the murder secret Enrico throws the prince's body into the sea and assumes the royal position himself. Because of his resemblance to the dead prince his real identity is not suspected,, and when, a short time later, the king dies, Enrico is hailed as the new monarch. In his first official duties he changes several of his father's rules, bringing upon himself the ill-feeling of his advisers.

The body of the prince is found in the sea and identified by Valerie as that of her lover Enrico. She tells of the present king's attempt to kidnap her, and writes a statement accusing him of the murder. With this accusation as a balm for their consciences the advisers conspire to do away with the king. He visits Valerie and reveals his true identity. As he leaves the house he is shot down by the chief of police. When Valerie arrives on the scene Enrico is dead, and the conspirators are amazed to learn that their victim is an imposter.

The American Kineto Corporation, it is reported, has suddenly done extraordinary business of late. Each of the features produced up to date has been sold out and several states clamor for more than the company can supply. There is every prospect that the next feature, entitled "Czernowska," or "A Woman's Treachery," will have a fine sale. The film is a portrayal of Russian life, embracing all the tragedy for which Russian dramas are notorious.

"Man Who Disappeared" Series Ends

Other Good Edisons

THE concluding picture of "The Man Who Disappeared" series will be released on August 18. The story of this picture, the twelfth, will appear in the September issue of the Popular Magazine.

One of the novel situations and the climax of the picture is the projecting of a picture within a picture. In the court room scene a projection machine is placed in the foreground behind the jury's box, and the murder which has been the hub of this series is re-enacted in motion pictures projected upon the wall.

Another of the unusual scenes is a view of the interior of the Edison Bronx studio, showing the actors, directors, stage-hands and cameramen hustling about preparing to stage a scene. Here the picture mentioned above as being projected in the court room scene is seen in the making.

For once Marc MacDermott's role as John Perriton does not call for strenuous action, Miriam Nesbitt as Mary Wales and Barry O'Moore as her brother, Nelson Wales, creating the greater part of the excitement.

Marc MacDermott as John Perriton, Miriam Nesbitt as Mary Wales.

The photography is clear and the settings rich and luxurious where appropriate, and plain and substantial-looking in the court and prison scenes.

At the close of the last chapter of the series we left Perriton a refugee in the apartment of his sweetheart, Mary Wales. The detective detailed to watch her movements sees her leave the house and returns to Nelson Wales with the news of his finding the hiding place of Perriton.

Their scheme of sending the hunted man a note asking him to come to Mary's aid works and Perriton is easily captured and placed under arrest. In jail Mary and a lawyer visit him to plan for his release, but get little encouragement from Perriton, who says that he and Nelson Wales were the only ones present at the time of the murder, and therefore the only hope is for a confession from Nelson. Returning from the jail an idea presents itself to Mary. A company of actors across the street are taking a scene for a moving picture company. Why not hire several of the actors, get them to make up to look like the principals in the murder, and have the picture run off at the trial as a means of reaching Nelson's conscience.

The arrangements are successfully made with the film company and the murder scene re-enacted according to Perriton's story.

Being the defendant at the trial, Perriton's plea is regarded as only natural, and his evidence discounted as practically worthless. Nelson takes the stand, tells a plausible story, and openly accuses Perriton of being the murderer. The attorney for the defense pleads and objects in vain. One man's word is as good as another's, and the circumstantial evidence is against the defendant, Perriton's chances seem poor indeed when the attorney's trump card is ready to be played.

Nelson is astonished to see the events of that dreaded night recorded in the motion pictures which are shown on the wall. Astonishment is followed by horror and extreme fear. His face working spasmodically, Nelson confesses the whole crime, clearing Perriton of all guilt.

The shock caused by his witnessing the re-enactment of his crime brings on an acute attack of heart trouble, and, before the jurors and spectators fairly recover from the surprise of the last few moments, Nelson pitches over on the stand, dead.

The sub-title states that the time of mourning has passed. The next scene shows Perriton and his wife, Mary Wales, leaving a church and being congratulated by the minister.

MOST every patriot knows that Francis Scott Key wrote the national anthem and that it was composed on board a British prison ship, but comparatively few know the details that led to the event.

The story of this famous piece of history forms the theme of the Edison release of August 28, "The Birth of the Star Spangled Banner." Most of the ship scenes are exterior views, but one of them is an interior and is a wonderful piece of studio construction.

The picture is well acted and staged, and one that will "take" any time but particularly now, as this is the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of the song which has been adopted as the national hymn.

An excellent costume drama is Edison's "The Birth of the Star Spangled Banner."

The last scene in which the fog rises from the river disclosing the flag waving at the top of the fort is a powerful one and cannot fail to enthuse any audience that sees it.

The period of the story is the year 1814, when the British naval and military forces are threatening Washington and President Madison sent the Declaration of Independence in the care of his aide, Captain Potter, to the commandant of Fort McHenry. On the way Potter stops at the home of Doctor Beanes whose daughter, Helen, he greatly admires. A group of British officers ride up to the house and Potter and Helen take refuge in a secret panel in the wall. Here Potter hears the plans of the British to attack Fort McHenry within two days.

The officers find Potter's hat in the room, and attempt to force Dr. Beanes to disclose his hiding place by torturing him. Suddenly the panel slides back and the officers find themselves confronted by two pistols in the hands of Captain Potter. Holding the British officers at bay Potter jumps on a horse and escapes, arriving safely at Fort McHenry.

Dr. Beanes is arrested and placed on board a British cartel ship. Helen appeals to President Madison for intercession in her father's behalf and he sends one of his aides and Francis Scott Key to interview Admiral Cockburn. The Admiral agrees to release the doctor but insists on the Americans remaining on board the cartel ship "Minden" until after the coming battle. Key and his companions watch the bombardment of the fort anxiously and when, towards morning, the firing ceases they fear that it has surrendered.

As the sun rises and the stars and stripes are seen waving above the fort, Key kneels in thanksgiving and is inspired to embody his emotions in a song which will live forever.

The last scene shows the song's first introduction. A group of men gather at a meeting-place, three or four of them reading from one sheet, and sing "The Star Spangled Banner," in which they are led by the composer himself.

"ANDY LEARNS TO SWIM," a one reel Edison comedy, will be released on August 12. The other releases of this series featuring the popular little star, Andy Clark, have been most successful and this one will be no exception for it is, if anything, less conventional and more boyish and natural than the majority. One of its attractions is that in the big beach scenes Andy is worked into the atmosphere of the thing and the people are not seen staring at him and the camera.

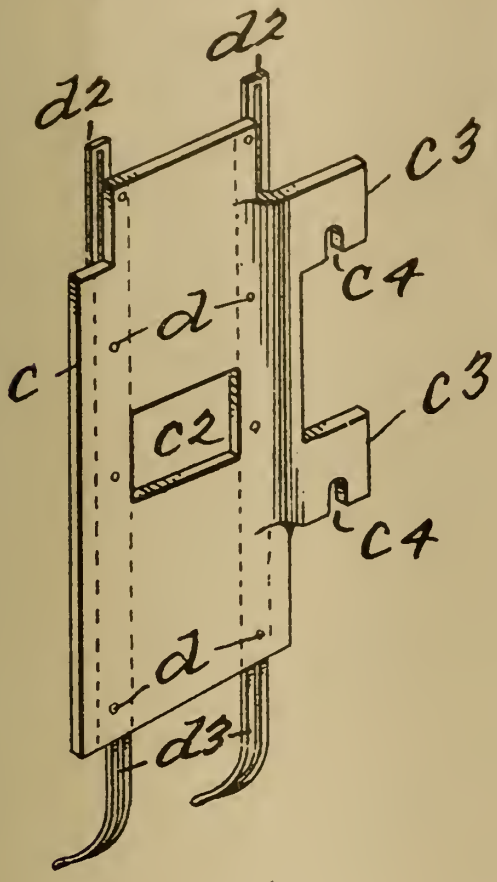
Andy arrives at the seashore and is coaxed into getting a suit and going in swimming. At home his mother is astonished to see his face and hands so clean and thinks him sick, but Andy assures her that he is all right and that he learned to swim. She scolds him for going into the water and forbids his doing it again.

One day Andy is in swimming when he spies his mother coming. He hurries out, dresses, and runs home. On his mother's return he denies having been near the water, but cannot satisfactorily explain how his hair happens to be wet.

Taking chances on getting away Andy runs out of the house closely pursued by his mother. Turning a corner he is stopped by a man and held until his mother arrives. As he is being led home they hear someone crying for help, and rush to a near-by river where they see a girl struggling in the water. Andy's mother tells the stranger to jump in and save her, but he says he can't swim. Andy offers to go to her aid but his mother forbids him. While she has her back turned he slips into the water, swims out to the girl and helps her ashore. The last few feet of the film show "Andy the Hero" decked with medals and wearing a large-sized self-satisfied smile.

Mutual's Animal Picture

Thursday, August 13, the Domino Company will release a two reel drama "The Romance of the Sawdust Ring," the first wild animal picture ever released on the Mutual program. The original script of this photo-play called for a five reel feature, but Thomas H. Ince, managing director of the Domino Company, took only the meat of the script, thus making what he considers one of the best and most expensive two part pictures ever released.



Punches are numerous and thrilling, and the big ones are in scenes in which Frank Borzage, the youthful leading man of the Domino, fights a full grown lion with a pitch-fork, and where a jaguar is seen to strike down and attack one of the characters of the picture.

Recent Patents in Motography

By David S. Hulfish

No. 1,059,067. For an Improved Film Trap Door. Issued to Edwin S. Porter, New York, N. Y., assignor of half to Francis B. Cannock, New York, N. Y.

The illustration shows the tension clip or "trap door" of the film gate.

This trap door consists of a plate c having a film window c2 and having two ears c3 each with a notch at c4.

The plate c is held in the film gate by hooking the ears c3 over pins in the gate frame, where it is held by a spring latch arrangement. The whole plate c with its tension strips (to be described) may be readily unlatched and removed from the gate for inspection and cleaning.

Secured to the film side of the plate c, and by means of small screws or slip dowel pins d, are two parallel resilient strips d2 which normally bear against the film to produce a tension and to prevent buckling in the film window, the strips being long and curved to extend downwardly around the intermittent sprocket just below the film gate, and being provided with slots at d3 for the teeth of the sprocket so that the spring strips may bear directly upon the film and thus insure an exact relationship between the film and the sprocket by always pressing the film down upon the sprocket teeth.

The spring latch arrangement for holding the trap door plate c is so arranged that the plate c may be held to press the strips d against the film, or may be held by a detaining finger to keep a clearance between strips d and the film and sprocket to permit the motion head to be threaded up, the operation of the detaining finger to release the plate c then permitting that plate to slip forward to grasp and thereafter to control the film.

The claims of the patent read upon this last mentioned feature.

No. 1,059,276. For an Improved Intermittent Mechanism for Motion-Picture Machines. Issued to John C. Collins, New York, N. Y., assignor of half to Otto F. Miller, New York, N. Y.

The intermittent sprocket is mounted upon a shaft which carries also a wheel 7 having four pins. These pins in the figures are numbered 17, 18, 19, 20, and are placed equally spaced around the wheel 7. Reversing the order of the usual Geneva movement, where the pin wheel is the driving member of the intermittent pair, the pin wheel here is the driven member, being driven by a cam wheel 6.

The cam wheel 6 is provided with an annular groove 11 which is not a complete annulus, but merges into operating passages 12 and 13.

During the projection of a single image of the film, the two wheels 6 and 7 maintain the position shown by the figure at the left in the two figures of the patent reprinted herewith. The outside face of the wheel 6 engages the pins 17 and 19 while pin 18 is held in the groove 11. The intermittent wheel 7 therefore is held locked and motionless.

Imagine now that the driving wheel 6 is turning rapidly in the same angular direction as the hands of a clock take, that is to say, with the top moving to the right, then soon end 21 of the outer portion of the wheel 6 clears from the pin 17 and at about the same time, the projection of the central portion of the wheel 6 strikes the pin 18, starting the pin wheel 7 to shift the film .

The projection referred to passes between the pins 17 and 18 and the movement of the wheel 7 by pin 18 causes pin 17 to move into the path of end 22 of the outer part of wheel 6 with the result that pin 17 is drawn fully into the groove 11 and pin 20 is drawn down upon the outside of the wheel 6, the point 22 passing under pin 18 and again locking the intermittent wheel 7.

By proper design of the operating pathways 13 and 12 the shift of the intermittent wheel 7, and the shift of the film therefore, may be made any desired fraction of the total revolution of the driving wheel, 6, and therefore may be made as quickly as desired.

The first of the six claims of the patent as issued is very broad in its scope, and reads as follows:

1. In an intermittent motion for moving picture machines, an intermittent wheel formed with a plurality of pins projecting from the face thereof, and a cam wheel having a substantially annular groove adapted to successively receive said pins for moving the same a predetermined distance on each rotation of the cam wheel.

No. 1,059,286. A Device for Lighting Kinematographic Projection Apparatus by Means of Sunlight. Issued to Silvio Doccetti, Cagliari, Italy.

This invention hails from sunny Italy, where it is to be presumed there is always sunlight when wanted and where, it is to be presumed further, kinematographic exhibitions are given frequently in the daytime. It is stated that safety from fire risk is one of the advantages to be obtained, but one which has seen the ability of an ordinary reading glass to fire a piece of newspaper would be inclined to suspect an ability in a pair of projection condensers to fire a motion picture film.

A mirror is provided at 10 in the figure for projection the light of the sun into the condenser tube and thence to the film.

The mirror may be tilted upon its hinge at 2 and may be rotated with its supporting base block, and further may be shifted crosswise of the frame of the machine. These three movements are independent and do not interfere in any way with each other. The three movements of the mirror are controlled independently by the three independent hand wheels 26, 37, 48. It is stated that an automatic heliostat is not suitable for motion picture work.

There are five claims, each including in considerable detail the mechanism for operating the mirror.

No. 1,060,128. For an Improved Dissolving View Apparatus. Issued to Alvah C. Roebuck, Chicago, Ill., assignor to The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., Chicago, Ill.

This invention relates to optical projecting apparatus of the combined kinetoscope and dissolving view steropticon type, and has for its various objects: to provide a simple and efficient arrangement and combination of parts with which a large number of lantern slides can be automatically manipulated and alternatively and successively shifted into line with the optical axis of the lantern, with an avoidance of an exhibition of the slides in wrong order, or with the views reversed or upside down. And with which the slides of a double optical lantern have alternate and successive movement and the required dissolving view effect attained by the single operating handle of the mechanism; the arrangement permitting a ready rewinding or returning of the slides to their original position preparatory to the next exhibition. The operation and manipulation of the apparatus being of so simple a nature as to afford the operator ample time for keeping the lamps in proper adjustment and condition, to rewind the kinetoscope film, and perform other duties ordinarily required on the part of an operator while exhibiting a combination of optical lantern views and motion pictures. To provide a simple and convenient arrangement of parts whereby a ready and rapid change can be effected from optical lantern views to motion pictures and vice versa, without disturbing the operative connections of the dissolving view shutter. To provide a simple and efficient construction whereby the maximum amount of illumination is available in the projection of motion pictures, and capable of ready change to suit the requirement in projecting lantern views. To provide a ready means for effecting the registration of the pair of stereopticon views and the motion picture views on the same spot on the screen.

As will appear in the figure from the patent reproduced herewith, the slides are arranged in linked chain form in a magazine at the top of the projection machine, and are fed link by link into the projecting position, passing then into a receiving magazine below.

Power Supply for Projector Arcs

By A. C. Davis*

THE cinematograph has apparently firmly established itself as a part of our national life. The earlier assertions that it was merely a fad of which the public would soon weary, are completely negatived by the ever increasing number of show houses offering motion pictures as the principal attraction. Nearly every small town has its motion-picture houses and cities of any considerable size usually support several. These pictures may be hard on the eyes, but their educational and amusement value is unquestionable.

Recent improvements in apparatus and methods for supplying and regulating current for the powerful arc of the machine, do much to improve the clearness and detail of the projected image as well as to eliminate the trying flicker and pulsating intensity noticeable when cruder apparatus was in use.

The diversity of the many types of current-transforming and regulating devices now on the market often lead to confusion in attempting to make a choice. In fact, the lack of definite knowledge by the operators of the technical side of the proposition and the consequent incomplete information furnished to the manufacturers of electrical apparatus of the exact requirements to be met in specific cases, has in several instances led to furnishing more or less unsuitable equipment, resulting in dissatisfaction and subsequent alterations or changes.

The principal requirement in any case is to secure a satisfactory minimum illumination on the screen. It is hence well to bear in mind that the average candlepower for moving picture projectors depends upon: (1), size of the picture; (2), distance of lantern from screen; (3), density or tinting of the film; (4), material of the curtain; the candlepower required at the arc is directly proportional to the illuminated area of the screen and the distance of the projector from the same.

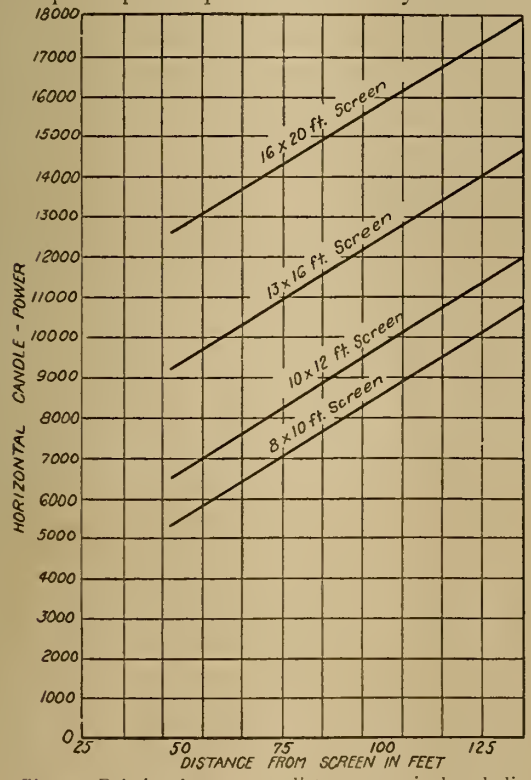

Fig. 1.—Relation between candlepower required and distance from screen.

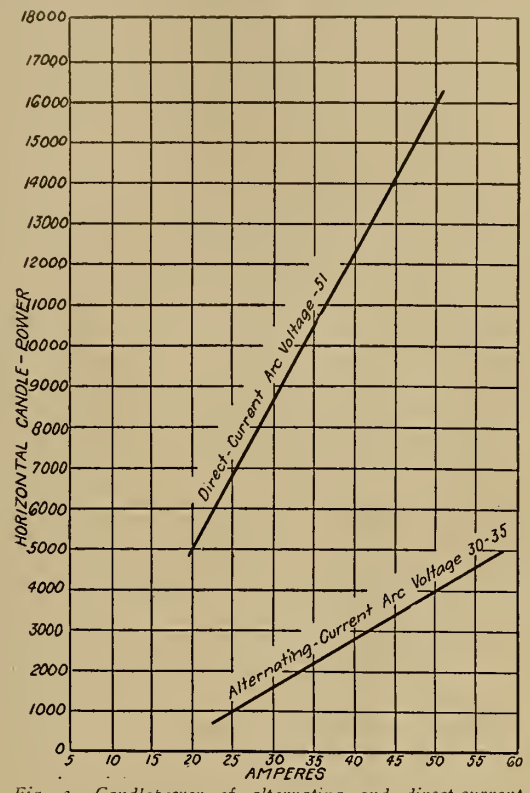

Fig. 2.—Candlepower of alternating and direct-current arcs for projecting lamps.

Although the density of ordinary black and white films varies to a certain extent, this is not ordinarily a serious matter, and moreover variations of this kind are often not more than a necessary means of securing the effect of night scenes, clouded atmosphere, etc., and are by no means defects to be modified by candlepower adjustments. Tinted films, or the use of color screens, as in the Kinemacolor machines, may require two or three times as much light as the ordinary black and white films.

The following formula will give approximately the candlepower which should be supplied for the projecting lantern using standard films and muslin or semi-reflecting screens. Mirror screens will be found to require approximately 80 per cent of the value given by the formula

$$C = 30A + 60D.$$

In this formula, C is the horizontal candlepower required; A is the illuminated area of the screen in square feet; and D is the distance from projector to the screen in feet.

It should be noted that the term "60 D" of the above formula represents the amount of the illumination required to overcome the obscuring effect of dust, vapor, smoke, etc., in the air and is an important factor in determining the amount of current which the lantern will require. The curves in Fig. 1 are plotted from the above formula for several common sizes of screens and for the ordinary range of distances.

For alternating-current arcs in ordinary use about the best light is obtained by using five-eighths-inch cored carbons set approximately in line with each other and inclined backward at an angle of nearly 30 degrees. In an alternating-current arc the light source is found on the incandescent tips of both the upper and lower electrodes, which are accordingly left fairly close together in order to secure a nearer approach to point illumination, thus taking a relatively high current at the moderate arc voltage of 30 to 35 volts.

For direct current a good combination consists of a five-eighths-inch cored carbon for the positive or upper electrode and a half-inch solid carbon for the negative or lower electrode. In this case the illumination comes chiefly from the heated anode spot on the upper carbon. The two carbons are, therefore, run farther apart, requiring less current at the higher arc voltage of 50 to 60 volts, and the lower carbon is commonly drawn slightly forward in order to form the anode spot on the front side of the anode tip. The curves in Fig. 2 show the horizontal candlepower of alternating-current and direct-current arcs under favorable conditions.

Whatever method of supplying current may be chosen, it will be necessary to guard against the natural tendency of the current in the arm to fluctuate, as well as to prevent its reaching excessively high values when the arc is struck. This may be accomplished by the use of series resistance or reactance, or, when the current is supplied from special generators, by employing a differentially compounded field. The effect produced by the use of these devices is that if the current suddenly begins to increase the arc voltage is immediately reduced, or vice versa, thus tending to maintain the current close to its normal value. The differentially wound field of a special generator for motion-picture work accomplishes a similar purpose without actual loss of power, so that when only one arc is to be run from such a machine its voltage may be set for the desired arc voltage.

In practice many motion-picture houses at times desire to operate two spot-lights at once from the same source. In this case it becomes necessary to use a ballast resistance in series with each arc giving a voltage drop of approximately 15 or 20 volts. Special generators or other apparatus intended for this service must, therefore, have an extra voltage capacity of this amount.

The following list includes practically all the common methods of supplying current for the projector arc.

(1). Direct supply from a central station's alternating-current power circuit using series reactance for reducing the line voltage to the pressure required at the arc.

(2). Supply from standard-voltage alternating-current circuits using transformers instead of reactance for reducing the voltage.

(3). Direct supply from a central station's direct-current circuit using series resistance for reducing the voltage.

(4). Pulsating current from the mercury-arc rectifier.

(5). Direct current from special generating apparatus, that is, motor-generator set, rotary converter or engine-driven generator when central-station current is not available.

Alternating current taken directly from lighting circuits is very conveniently secured and requires a minimum outlay for apparatus. Using a reactance for reducing the voltage has the disadvantage of causing a very low power-factor, to which the central station is likely to seriously object, and of being somewhat inconvenient as regards regulation of the arc voltage. By using a transformer in place of the reactance a good power-factor is secured, while most commercial types provide, by means of taps on the winding and a regulating switch, for a fair degree of convenient adjustment. The alternating-current arc, however, does not furnish a quality of light consistent with the modern standards in this art, the light having a decided reddish tinge as well as a trying flicker and tendency to pulsate.

When approximation to continuous current is secured by the use of mercury-arc rectifiers a much better quality of light is furnished than by alternating current, giving at the same time an arc which consumes fewer watts per candlepower. The ordinary commercial rectifier, moreover, is economical in first cost and provides a fair degree of convenient voltage regulation. The wattage consumption for a given candlepower is fully as low as for any other type of outfit. The maintenance costs are, however, apt to be high due to possible breakage and ultimate deterioration of the tubes.

It is stated by experienced operators that the light secured from a purely direct-current source is distinctly superior to any other. The wattage consumption when current is taken from lighting circuits is necessarily high, due to a loss in the series resistance. This is partially compensated for, however, by the saving in first cost of apparatus. The same results can, however, be secured with much better efficiency by the use of a motor-generator set, and where alternating current only is available, by the use of a motor-generator set or rotary converter. These have a relatively high first cost, low upkeep, very convenient regulation, and a power consumption practically as low as the rectifier.

In conclusion, it may be pointed out that each of the types of apparatus above described has its peculiar field of usefulness. The larger houses doing a long-hour business should have the best and most economical operating equipment, and the first cost becomes a matter of minor importance. For smaller houses or for machines in occasional use a cheaper form of apparatus should be used, even though the operating efficiency may be inferior. Such disadvantages as inferior quality of light due to the use of an alternating-current arc will often be counterbalanced by the decrease in the first cost of equipment.

Lasky-Belasco Production

The first of the Belasco plays to be put into motion pictures will be "The Heart of Maryland," according to a decision which was reached by David Belasco and Jesse L. Lasky this week. The scenario has been arranged by Mr. Belasco and turned over to the Lasky Feature Film Company, who will make the production.

The company will be sent into Southern Maryland, where the scenes of the play are laid. Starting at Frederick the company will traverse the famous Shenandoah Valley and Braddock's Road, which runs through Cumberland, west, along which the Army of the Potomac marched.

PERSONAL NOTES.

The mountain scenes of the "Trey O'Hearts" series have been completed and the Wilfred Lucas' Universal Company has left Hollywood for San Diego where the spectacular sea-faring installment of the series will be staged. To furnish sensations for this part of the drama two ships will be destroyed at sea.

Residents of Tucson, Ariz., have been so liberal in giving various wild animals they have captured to the Eclair players located there that the director has started a miniature zoo and established himself as keeper. He threatens to put on a jungle picture in the near future.

The U. S. S. Prairie has installed a Power's Cameragraph and the U. S. S. North Dakota has been equipped with a 6A model with motor drive.

A motor boat proposal is the feature of "A Lesson in Mechanics," a one reel comedy being produced by W. C. Cabanne, at the Reliance and Majestic Hollywood Studios with Dorothy Gish and Robert Harron in the leading roles.

The first drama which will be produced by the new Rex company, of which Joseph de Grasse is director, is entitled, "The Girl Who Was Afraid of Love," featuring Pauline Bush. It contains a powerful character declination of a super-bashful girl who almost wrecks her life in attempting to avoid the tender passion.

The old saying, "nobody loves a fat man," has been proven wrong, through the fact that Charles Hundt, the genial and corpulent property man at the Eclair Western studio, has taken unto himself a wife.

The entire stock company of the Pathe Freres Company at Jersey City, with the exception of Pearl White, Crane Wilbur and Paul Panzer have been released and in the future this concern will employ players for special engagements only. The policy of producing nothing but feature pictures in their American studios will be continued.

A Power's Cameragraph has been secured by the Y. M. C. A., Rockton, South Carolina, through Universal Film & Supply Company, Charlotte, N. C.

J. Warren Kerrigan will be seen as a doctor, who swims two miles through a raging sea with his medicine case strapped to his back to save the father of his sweetheart, in "There Is a Destiny," a Victor drama soon to be released.

A gripping romance, with its setting in Mexico during the recent war trouble, is told in "On the Border," being produced by Jack Adolfi, at the Reliance and Majestic studios on the Coast. Irene Hunt is featured as a Spanish dancing girl, who at the risk of her life saves her sweetheart, an American officer, from assassination.

Charles Dickens' last novel, "The Mystery of Edwin Drood," which was never completed owing to the great author's death, is being produced in motion pictures by the Blaché Studios. The well known English actor, Mr. Tom Terriss, has dramatized the novel for picture presentation and completed the famous story in the manner that he thinks the great Dickens intended.

Webster Cullison, managing director of the Eclair Western studio located at Tucson, Arizona, is in New York on business connected with the organization of two new companies for the studio in cactus land.

The Allen Feature Film Corporation, Providence, R. I., has placed a Powers Cameragraph in the Broad Street School of that city and a like machine has been installed in P. T. Powers' Airdome, Sheepshead Bay, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The "Universal Boy" (Matty Roubert) had the pleasure of meeting the Honorable Young Yang Ying, Chinese consul-general, at the Universal's Imp studio last week.

Thomas Ince and Mack Sennett of the New York Motion Picture Company arrived in New York this week where they will remain for a short time, enjoying a vacation and transacting business. The former has been at work continually for the past three years making a world-wide reputation for the Kay-Bee, Broncho and Domino brands of films and the latter has been equally busy for about the same period of time establishing the Keystone films.

The Colgate Film Exchange have bought the Pacific Coast rights to "The Toll of Mammon," the big feature of the Excelsior Feature Film Company for the states of California, Oregon and Washington.

Thousands of ardent admirers of the novelist, Marie Corelli, will welcome the release of George Kleine's splendid four-reel feature "Vendetta," through the Special Feature Department of the General Film Co., September 1st. The film story is adopted from Miss Corelli's novel of the same name, and none of the splendid dramatic opportunities given by the novelist have been overlooked in making the picture.

Besides acting in pictures, the greatest joy of Pauline Bush, the clever leading lady of the Universal Company, is to steal down to the ocean side with a pencil and a block of paper and plan a new scenario. Some of the best picture plays she has written have been developed while she enjoyed the cool breezes and listened to the waves on the beach.

Myrtle Stedman and two friends "hiked" up Mount Lowe recently. She says she had a hankering to see some real snow—she used to live in Colorado, up some 10,000 feet, and the trip to Truckee with the Bosworth company in the spring whetted her appetite for more of the white rain.

Cleo Madison plays the roles of two sisters with dispositions as different as day and night in the serial "Trey O' Hearts," in which she is being featured. To distinctly characterize each part is a task that is taxing her dramatic skill to the fullest extent.

In reminiscing at the Los Andes Photo-players Club one evening last week, Charles Ray, the Kay Bee lead, was describing his feelings when Thomas Ince handed him his first contract. He says it is the first time that he ever felt at all important, but the feeling soon wore off when he showed it on the quiet to an old timer who squinted sideways at it and said "Huh! I've got a box full of them."

Arthur Rosenbach, sales manager of the Excelsior Feature Film Company, is making a flying trip through the Middle West. Despite the alleged depression in business Mr. Rosenbach reports several desirable deals.

The announcement that George Kleine had begun the manufacture of pictures in America has resulted in hundreds of scenarios being submitted to the Chicago Offices. Mr. Kleine announces that, for the present at least, there will be no scripts purchased as he will manufacture in this country film subjects adapted from well known legitimate productions only. The first of these will be "Officer 666"

Louise Glaum the delightful little actress appearing under Harry Edwards in the "Universal Ike Jr." series has been very sick but is back at work again.

Carlyle Blackwell is in Los Angeles again and Jack Dillon, the "heavy" who was associated with Blackwell when he was with the Kalem Company has joined him. The star will start work at once in a temporary studio while he is building his own.

The Consumers Feature Film Service, with executive offices at 30 North Michigan Boulevard, Chicago, has increased its capital stock to $1,500,000. The new company is to be hereafter known as the Consumers Film Corporation.

Starting away about four weeks ago with three trunksful of features, Charles (Feature) Abrams and Louis Goldstein, his assistant, have just returned to New York, without the features but carrying orders amounting to $12,000. Among the state right men to whom they sold were A. A. Weiland and Meyer Silverman of Pittsburgh, William R. Finley of Toledo, Ben D. Crose of Indianapolis, Wolverine Feature Film Company of Detroit, General Feature Film Company of Chicago, Swanson-Crawford Film Company of St. Louis and Herrick Feature Film Company of Des Moines.

Francis Ford and Grace Cunard, creators of mystery films, are back at work at the Universal Hollywood, Cal., studio after a short vacation in the east.

Ben D. Crose of the Empress Feature Film Company of Indianapolis left New York last Saturday after a few days' stay. The purpose of his visit was to confirm arrangements for the sale of exhibition rights on "The Black Triangle" in Indiana and Kentucky.

The stage at the Strand theater, on Market street, Newark, has undergone a great transformation. It is now a Japanese fairy garden. Japanese flowers spread their fragrance through the house, Japanese birds and butterflies flutter about, their gay plumage vying in iridescence with the sparkling colors of the electric fountain. Sand-covered walks lead from the beautiful French chateau's porticoes at each side of the stage to the fountain, behind which is seen the charming facade of the central wall of the chateau. The garden was designed by Jules Gerstle, the assistant manager of the theater.

The Colonial Amusement company secured a permit to erect a $25,000 moving picture theater on Vliet street, between Fifteenth and Sixteenth streets, Milwaukee.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believoing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in MOTOGRAPHY as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

Essanay Produces Athletic Film

"The Masked Wrestler"

BECAUSE it is "different" and because it has the "tremolo touch," or in commoner terms the "punch," Essanay's two-reel release of Friday, August 21, is certain to please the varied tastes of the motion picture fans throughout the country.

The story is of romantic nature, with the element of mystery running throughout. A mysterious wrestler who refuses to appear in the ring without his mask is the character about which the plot revolves and to make it still more appealing the action takes place in gay Paris, the unknown conqueror being the idol of the French metropolis.

Toward the end there are three points at which the story could be successfully brought to a close, and as each expected crisis is passed the interest increases until the last climax is reached and all is solved. The scenario for the photoplay has been arranged with great care and the production of it shows touches of the virile hand of E. H. Calvert.

The acting is splendid, Francis X. Bushman outdoing himself in a sort of double role, which dissolves into one character in the denouement. He incidentally proves himself to be a mat artist of no mean ability and the disclosure of his splendid physique will be a delight to his countless admirers. Miss Beverly Bayne, playing opposite him, carries her part with equal success and gives a real French touch to her expressions. Bryant Washburn as the villain does some very clever work. The support accorded the leads is good.

The setting is attractive at all times and the sight of two men testing their powers in fair, manly combat should prove a very attractive novelty. It is real wrestling, too, and the actors opposing Mr. Bushman do some very clever work. A number of supernumeraries are used, and that all help to create the French atmosphere by their actions and dress is a fact worthy of mention.

The opening scenes show the "Masked Wrestler," the idol of Paris, in action with an opponent. It is one of the big matches of the year and all of the gay capital's society has turned out to see it. Among those present are Margery Winters, a young American girl, and her father. She is full of life, and the sights in the great metropolis have thrilled her, but before returning home she decided that she wanted to see the mysterious wrestler of whom she had heard so much, and it took but little coaxing to get her father to take her to the match.

The "Mysterious Wrestler" wins after a hard battle, and in her excitement Margery throws the bouquet she is carrying to him. The conqueror sees her and comes to her box, where he thanks her for the flowers and, according to the French custom, kisses her hand. It is a case of love at first sight with Margery, for, even though she cannot see his face, she feels he is the one man for her.

The next day she goes to the home of Louis De Luzon, a suitor, who has loved her for a long time, and whom she likes to a certain extent but not enough to consider him as a husband, and asks him if he will try to arrange a meeting between her and the masked wrestler. Despite the pain he feels at her request, he says that it would be a good plan to have the mysterious man come to a reception she is to give at her home a few days before she leaves for her own country. Margery agrees to this and leaves the details to Louis, and the night of the reception the "Masked Wrestler" appears but comes with the black cap over his head and refuses to remove it. M. Lefevre, a scheming adventurer, who has been trying to win the hand of Margery in order to secure her fortune, sees her marked attention to the athlete and determines in some manner to be revenged. With several friends he lures the "Masked Wrestler" into the smoking apartment and there attempts, without success, to snatch the mask from his face.

Angry, Lefevre challenges the wrestler to a duel, but again he proves but putty in the hands of the strong man. He slinks away but his hatred has been aroused and he determines he will get even with the other man by forcing him to unmask. The night after the reception the "Masked Wrestler" is scheduled to meet "The Lion," the world's champion, and when Lefevre learns of the latter's hate for his opponent he offers him a large bribe to unmask the mysterious man in the ring. "The Lion" accepts.

The afternoon of the contest Margery receives a note from the "Masked Wrestler," telling her that he is tired of the game and that after winning the world's championship that night he intends to retire, but that he will unmask before he leaves the ring so she may see who he is. Meanwhile Louis in his apartments sadly realizes that the wrestler, and not he, has won Margery's heart.

The time for the contest arrives and Margery and her father go to the hall. Lefevre fears "The Lion" may not be true to his promise and sends him a note reminding him of the reward he will receive if he tears the mask from his opponent. "The Lion" drops the note and it is found by Margery and her father, and as the men step into the ring the girl throws the note to the "Masked Wrestler." He reads it and determines that "The Lion" shall suffer for his part in the plot.

Margery learns that the wrestler will accept her invitation.

Time is called and the struggle begins. Neither can gain the advantage, until at last the thought of his opponent's low trick comes back to the masked man and, with the strength of a beast, he floors him. The moment he has been declared champion he removes his mask and when he faces Margery she cannot believe her own eyes. The "Masked Wrestler" is Louis. He advances to her box, and as she looks appealingly toward him he bows his head and after devotedly kissing her hand leaves. He realizes that it was the "Masked Wrestler" that she had fallen in love with, and that he is only Louis. But the girl knows now that the love has penetrated beneath the mask.

The next day Margery is to sail for America, and the morning finds Louis struggling with his pride. He knows what she means to him, and he feels that she would love him if he would only go to her, but he knows that she had preferred the other to him before and he cannot force himself to down his feelings.

The hour for her leaving approaches and the man still struggles. At last he conquers himself and goes to her. Margery is waiting for him, and the man who has been proclaimed the greatest in the world in his profession finds that he has been also successful in love.

The cast is as follows:

Louis De Luzon.....Francis X. Bushman
Margery Winters, a young American Heiress..Beverly Bayne
Her Father.....Rapley Holmes
M. Lefevre.....Bryant Washburn
The "Lion".....Paul Raas

Monkey Conquers Determined Directors

One of the most recent additions to the directing staff of the Vitagraph Company is Edmund Stratton. A scenario was handed him for production. He had no difficulty in selecting his cast until he came to the part to be played by a monkey, who was to play opposite the organ grinder. They selected a simian from the Vitagraph menagerie, but he had not the stage training required under the tutelage of an organ grinder. In the first place, he refused to wear clothes, showing he was a very bad actor; then his absolute refusal of the money which was offered him by the audience, proved that he was absolutely impossible as a motion picture player. The director's Waterloo came, however, when the little rascal took refuge under the skirts of one of the actresses.

Clever Story of the Secret Service

Eclectic Releases Features

ONE of the late Eclectic feature releases is a five part drama entitled "The Boundary Rider." The story reveals the perfect co-operation of a band of opium smugglers and their "fence," a man whose apparent income is from dealing in stocks and bonds. The ingenious methods employed by the band in transporting the opium, however, are more than discounted by the slow but sure system of the revenue service, and the bold courage and fearlessness of the men who patrol the lonely, thickly wooded districts along the border, ever ready to risk their lives in the performance of their duty. These men represent the actual grasp of the far-reaching arm of the law.

The story contains many dramatic situations and puzzling developments, and at the start creates interest which is sustained to the end. The action is quick and purposeful in every scene, enlivening the story and making it one of interest to anybody.

The picture was produced by Wharton, Inc., whose studios are at Ithaca, New York. Many screen favorites are seen in the cast which contains Thurlow Bergen in the leading role as the broker's clerk; Elsie Esmond as Elsie Moore, of the secret service; F. W. Stewart as James Maxwell, the broker; William N. Bailey as Big Bill, the smuggler; and Harry Carr as Pablo, a halfbreed. The acting at all times is commendable and each characterization does full justice to its role.

Special mention is merited by the series of exterior scenes showing the route of the "opium log" from its start far up the river to its termination where it is seen shooting the rapids and riding over the falls.

The first important development of the story is the discovery by the government that Broker James Maxwell is continually receiving shipments of opium from the north and distributing the drug among the Chinese dens. Maxwell is in need of a stenographer. Elsie Moore of the secret service applies for the position and is accepted.

The chief of the smuggling gang receives a letter from the broker stating that, as he is unable to collect anything from his Chinese agent, the usual payment will not be forthcoming. Angered at this the chief visits the broker, they quarrel and Big Bill kills Maxwell. Thinking to capture the ringleaders Elsie has notified headquarters to send several men to meet her. They enter the office and discover the dead body of the broker. Circumstantial evidence all points to the clerk as the murderer. He is arrested, but on the way to the station manages to escape the accompanying detective and starts for Canada.

One of the clues picked up in the office is a button and an attached piece of cloth evidently torn from the murderer's coat during the struggle. Elsie requests to be placed on the case, and immediately starts north.

Weak from hunger and exposure the clerk is found by a ranger in the revenue service and taken to headquarters where he is cared for until fully recovered. Well again, he accepts a commission as a boundary rider and soon afterwards finds several clues to the location of the smugglers' rendezvous. The main party of the revenue men raid the base of the smugglers' operations while the former clerk proceeds to capture the leader at his shanty.

In the meantime the captain has a visitor, one of the detectives from the New York branch of the service. When the newly appointed ranger returns with the captured Big Bill he is recognized by the new arrival as the man accused of the murder of Maxwell, the broker. As the former clerk admits his identity and is about to be placed under arrest, Big Bill's little Chinese cook intervenes and charges the smuggler chief with being the guilty one. To prove the claim the cook takes from a pocket the piece of cloth found in the broker's office. It fits exactly into the hole where the top button should be on Big Bill's coat. The quick turn of events amazes the New York detective, especially as the evidence comes from his own headquarters. Instead of answering the rapid fire of questions the cook pulls off "his" hat, and there stands Elsie Moore, her appearance changed entirely by the absence of the queer little headdress. His first accuser, Elsie has turned out to be the clerk's final saviour, for with such conclusive evidence in their possession, the revenue officers will have no trouble in proving Big Bill as the murderer of the broker, Maxwell.

A STIRRING drama entitled "The Masked Motive" has lately been released by the Eclectic Film Company. It is in five parts and cleverly presented. One of its points of merit is that, while all of its developments modify the story in some measure and contribute towards the "ripening" of the climax, they are not pronounced enough to suggest any certain conclusion, keeping one in suspense as to the ending of the story until it is ready to disclose it itself.

The scenes and settings in every case are all that could be asked and harmonize exactly with the trend of the story. From the fact that several costly scenes could have been eliminated without interfering with or veiling the plot it is evident that good results were the only objective point in staging the production. One of these is a scene in India showing several thatched huts and a group of natives in the background; another is a perfect theater scene viewed from the position of one of the cast in a box and showing the stage, orchestra, and audience. Each of these represents but a few feet of film, nothing essentially significant in the picture, and probably a good bit of expense in the making.

The photography of both the interior and exterior scenes is alike clear and soft. The members of the cast are of distinctly French type, quick and rather jerky in their motions, but with splendid powers for emotional and dramatic portrayal.

In the beginning of the story there are two distinct threads. One, a rich girl whose marriage to Count Rene blasts the long cherished hope of her father's secretary, Phillip, who loves Sophie but has never dared to make it known to her. The other thread is the marriage of Sophie's maid, Marie Jean, to the peasant Bertrand. The girls are married on the same day, and immediately afterwards Phillip leaves for India.

One of Count Rene's intimate friends is a Dr. Renault who secretly loves Sophie. To put the count out of the way Renault hatches a scheme which will accomplish his object without involving him in any way. It is tried and proves successful. Rene meets a duelist and resents one of his slurring remarks. To vindicate his honor he faces him in a duel and is killed.

In the course of time a child is born to both of the girls. Sophie's baby is sickly and is sent to the country to be taken care of by a nurse but soon afterward dies. Marie Jean's baby becomes sick and, unable to buy proper care for it, she places it in an institution. Renault, the institution's doctor, steals the child and presents it to Sophie as her own claiming it has been restored to health through his care.

When Bertrand learns that it is through his drunken carelessness that the family is unprovided for, necessitating his child's being placed in a public institution, he promises to mend his ways and calls at the home to see his little girl. The authorities inform him that it has been stolen and that they have no trace of the kidnaper. At this time Phillips returns from India and, hearing of the poor people's distress, decides to aid them.

While searching for a clue to the child's whereabouts he comes across the death record of Sophie's baby. About this time he reads of the proposed marriage of Sophie and Dr. Renault, and becomes doubly sure that the doctor is in some way responsible for the kidnaping of Bertrand's child. The morning of the day on which the wedding is to take place Phillip accompanied by Marie Jean, Bertrand, and several others visits Sophie's home. As they expected Renault is there. Phillip asks to see the baby and shows her the death certificate of her own child. Sophie is at first overcome by the sad news but bravely faces the situation, returns Marie Jean's baby to her, and denounces Renault for his treachery. Phillip's reward is Sophie's promise to be his wife.

Realistic Wreck in Universal Serial

Wilfred Lucas, who is directing the "Trey O'Hearts" series for the Universal, returned from San Diego, Cal., to the Hollywood studios of that company a few days ago bringing with him the negative of "The Sea-Adventure," the third installment of the series, together with a story on himself, which was told rather reluctantly.

The action in one scene in "The Sea-Adventure" required that an ocean liner collide with a schooner and sink it. After purchasing the schooner, Director Lucas made arrangements with the captain of an ocean liner that he was to steer his ship straight into the schooner and sink it. As the captain was bound for Portland the director paid him in advance.

The dramatic business aboard the schooner was rehearsed and finally the schooner was moored, with the aid of three tugs, directly in the path of the ocean liner. The liner sped forward. It was a fine sight and Mr. Lucas was certain that he was about to stage the most sensational and realistic scene ever caught by a motion picture camera. The cameraman began turning the crank and the action aboard the schooner began.

At the critical moment—an instant before the two ships came together—the captain got "cold feet." It was too real even for the seasoned old tar.

"Port the helm!" he commanded. The helmsman obeyed orders and to his utter disgust and chagrin Director Lucas saw the liner miss his schooner by two yards and sail merrily away to Portland. The captain had their money and there was no way of stopping him because in missing the schooner he had complied with every requirement of marine law. Unfortunately marine law does not cover motion picture ventures.

At considerable expense and loss of time the director chartered another liner but this time he explained to the captain that there was absolutely no danger and that if he did not live up to his part of the contract he would ram his ship with the schooner. The second taking of the scene was a perfect success. So realistic was it, that guests at the Coronado hotel, who saw it, were thrown into a panic and thought they were witnessing a real ocean disaster.

Francesca Bertini, leading lady of the Celio Comcently, had the experience of teaching Abdul Hamid, the ex-Sultan of Turkey, how to perform the steps of the new "Maxixe."

Standing in "The Silver King"

Guy Standing.

Guy Standing is to be the star of "The Silver King," the first of the celebrated plays of Sir Henry Arthur Jones to be filmed by the Famous Players. "The Silver King" provides many unusual factors for pictorial reproduction, and the selection of Mr. Standing for the title role suggests judgment that could not be improved, because of his prominence on both the American and English stages, which greatly increases the value of his appearance in the production, and which in a unique manner corresponds with the international popularity of the subject.

The Famous Players have made arrangements to produce the American scenes of "The Silver King" in the West, in the exact localities in which the thrilling situations of the play occur. Henry Arthur Jones, on his recent visit to America, made a tour of the Famous Players studio, and took a keen interest in the preparations for the production of his play.

Horsley Plans Under Way

Harry Palmer, author of "Babbling Bess," the popular and geniously humorous serial comic which appeared in the daily newspapers, has been placed under contract to David Horsley and will commence work for the Centaur Film Company on August 1.

Arrangements have been made with the New York daily in which the drawings originally appeared, to resume their publication in its columns and to have them appear simultaneously in fifty-one of the leading newspapers throughout the United States and Canada. This is the first step in Mr. Horsley's plan, recently announced, to produce seven one reel comedies a week.

Milton Fahrney and his wife, Alexandra Phillips, have also been signed by Mr. Horsley and are now actively engaged in producing one reelers for the Centaur Film Company.

Balshofer Makes Trip East

Fred Balshofer, creator and manager of the Sterling Company releasing through the Universal Program, has just completed a flying visit to the home offices of the Universal Flm Manufacturing Company in New York.

He left for the Coast July 28 with the promise of many new and surprising things to come in the near future in the way of Sterling comedies. While in the East he delcared himself more than pleased at the way his productions were being received. He is soon to organize a new company but has not yet decided on his leading man and lady.

Leading Lady's Narrow Escape

The zeal of the California Motion Picture Corporation's producing corps for realism would have undoubtedly proven fatal to Miss Michelena, the celebrated prima donna whom it is featuring in the first few of its big productions, had it not been for the heroism of House Peters.

During the latter part of last week it was decided to devote a day to making a number of retakes for "Salomy Jane," the film dramatization of Bret Harte's story which is to be released shortly in six reels. One of the big scenes was the escape of the leading man from the vigilantes. During his spectacular flight the row boat, with which he put out down the river, became swamped and he then went over the rapids clinging to a log.

At just this point Miss Michelena, in the role of Salomy Jane, was supposed to swim out to mid stream and join him. Meantime the posse and horses were floundering up stream in the quicksand. Miss Michelena is an excellent swimmer and was making fine headway against the broad-side of the swift current when she was taken with a sudden cramp. The rapids were already driving her under a steep embankment when House Peters reached her just in the nick of time and pulled her, very much exhausted but still safe, onto the log.

Timely Subject by Feature Company

War, Europe-wide, has set the world in conversation in all tongues. Upon this theme of the Austrian's picking a quarrel with Servia because of the former's imperialistic itch for annexation, a feature film, extraordinary in its timeliness, will be put on the market in a few days by the Austro-Servian Film Feature Co., of 220 West 42nd street, New York. The title feature is "With Serb and Austrian." Its length is four reels.

The feature was made on the prophecy of a veteran diplomat that Austria and Servia would inevitably cross swords and was begun immediately after the assassination of the Austrian crown prince and his wife. The scenes are laid in Vienna and Belgrade, on to which capital the Austrian legions are now reported to be pressing over the bodies of their own dead and the fallen of the Serb defenders.

New Pathe Educational Film

"Training Army Dogs in Sweden" is a wonderfully interesting educational film released by Pathe Freres on August 4. The little Airedale terriers are seen going through the course of training which makes them so invaluable as messengers during time of war.

Their daily recreation, which is really the form in which their lessons are given them, is arranged in a regular schedule. Their first task in the morning is to follow the trail of one of the soldiers. The man turns, retraces, and mixes up his trail as much as possible to quicken the dog's scent and make him resourceful. Sometimes his trail will lead up a ladder, across the roofs of several buildings, and back to ground again by means of another ladder—all of which the dog must follow.

Other lessons consist of running, jumping, and climbing, and are followed by a run through the deep snow and being rolled around in it. This latter is meant to harden the dog and make him fit to stand severe weather conditions.

As an educational subject the picture cannot fail to interest as it is novel and full of action. On the same reel is "A Basque Wedding" showing the queer ceremonies of marriages in this little known town in the Pyrenese Mountains.

Vitagraph Companies in Open

Ralph Ince with a company of Vitagraph players is taking a four reel picture in which Earle Williams will assume the lead. The scenes are being enacted at Bay Shore, L. I. Theodore Marston, another one of the Vitagraph producers, with his company of players is located in the Adirondacks, where he will portray at least four pictures in which the mountain scenery and lakes will furnish the picturesque and romantic settings.

New Booking Offices Opened

Robert Corin and Arthur Loew have organized a new firm, The Associated Company, with offices at 1493 Broadway, New York, and are to supply what appears to be a great need in the producing end of the business. They have upwards of a thousand actors on hand ranging from leads to supers, ready for engagements on an hour's notice. The firm is ready to take the responsibility of supplying just those actors for the parts they are to take, and it feels that it would be a great saving of time to the actors, who instead of having to go from studio to studio would simply call on a central office, where all the information could be given as to the requirements of the various studios.

Plan Railroad Wreck

To have two huge railroad locomotives crash headlong into each other at a speed of forty miles an hour will be a feature of a big Labor Day celebration to be held at Philipsburg.

The scene for the collision will be staged on the Pittsburgh & Susquehanna Railroad at a point between Moshannon and Sterling, two towns near Philipsburg. The event is being arranged for the benefit of the Lubin Film Company, who, in order to get realistic moving pictures of a railway crash, is said to have entered into a contract with the railway people to pay $20,000 to have the "wreck" pulled off.

Superb Human Interest Film

Beautiful Scenic Effects

THE three-part film, "The Song of the Soul," which George Kleine will release through the special feature department of the General Film Company on August 24, is one of the best human interest films to come from the foreign studios for some time.

Its development is deliberate and convincing, and with beautiful Francesca Bertini in the leading role it is certain to grip all who see it and hold them until the final scene. The ending is tragic, but nevertheless it is certain to satisfy, for as the entire story is true to life in every detail it would be entirely out of place to work in the conventional ending of a love story.

It has been a long time since this reviewer has been privileged to witness a more convincing bit of acting than Miss Bertini does in this production, for her work maintains the same high quality from the beginning to the end and every expression she registers is well nigh perfect. Playing opposite her is Elmer Collins, who also makes a real flesh and blood person out of his character.

Robert declares his love to Ruth amid the Roman ruins.

Ruth is worried because of her grandmother's illness.

The interior sets and the exterior backgrounds are, as appears always to be the case with foreign productions, wonderfully exquisite. A number of the scenes have been taken among the ancient ruins of Rome, while others show a typical Italian seaside pleasure resort. An interior view of a theater, while not as large as some which have been seen on the screen, is so arranged that it appears to show the entire house. In some of the scenes tinting is used to good advantage, a sunset scene on the water being especially beautiful. The photography is clear throughout.

The first reel opens with the engagement of Ruth Benton, a young pianist, by a fashionable musical school to act as accompanist. Ruth is the sole support of her aged grandmother and the two rejoice when she secures the position. Their happiness is short-lived, however, for the grandmother is taken ill and Ruth spends all her time nursing her, leaving her bedside only to go to her work.

She is tardy several times and the director becomes angry, as it inconveniences his patrons; so he warns her that if she is late again he will have to dismiss her. The next day her grandmother is especially bad and she is unable to leave home at all. That afternoon she gets a letter from the school telling her that they will be unable to use her services any longer.

The doctor calls and says that the only thing that will help the old lady is some expensive medicine and to get this Ruth pawns the few jewels that she possesses. On her way back with the medicine she is met by a band of gay masqueraders who, in a spirit of glee, surround her and force her to go with them. She begs them to let her go and tells them of her errand, but they will not listen to her. Robert Sheldon, a struggling young composer who has not yet met with success, sees her efforts to escape and goes to her assistance.

Ruth and Robert fall in love at once, and he takes her home and secures her permission to call upon her. As both are interested in their art, they have long walks through the ruins of old Rome together and finally their talk changes to that of love.

Robert tries to compose a love song which will be the climax of the opera upon which he is working, but his brain refuses to form the right combination of notes. One evening as they are sitting together in the moonlight and the composer is trying unsuccessfully to arrange his song, Ruth asks him to let her try. He does, and, singing to her lover with all her heart, the girl gives him the inspiration that was lacking before and in no time the piece is composed. It is not long after that that the opera is produced and proves one of the greatest successes of the year. The young couple hurry home after the performance with the news of their success, but their joy is turned to sorrow when the grandmother dies in their arms as a result of her long suffering.

Two years pass and the pair have married. Robert is the lion of the social world, as he has written another equally successful opera and is very wealthy. Ruth dislikes the social affairs, as she has never been used to them. She goes to them, however, to please her husband, but slowly their different views on the subject lead them apart.

An automobile party is arranged and while out in the country the car carrying Ruth and her husband meets with an accident and the girl is badly injured.

Their long walks slowly turned their talk to words of love.

The physician who attends her says that her only chance to regain her health is to take a long rest on the seashore. The pair go to one of the most fashionable resorts in Italy, and there Robert again becomes the ardent lover he was before their marriage and Ruth is very happy.

Slowly she regains her health and they plan to soon return to their home, but Robert one day falls victim to the charms of an adventuress who is at the resort and delays their going. Ruth never suspects him, but one day while sweeping the shore with her eye glasses she sees the pair together in the water, Robert teaching the adventuress to swim.

Though a great doubt arises in her heart, she puts it aside and determines it is only friendship between her husband and the other woman, and when Robert shows all his old love for her she forgets the incident entirely. The days pass and still Robert wishes to remain at the resort. Again Ruth is haunted by the fear that something is wrong and worry causes her health to fail rapidly.

Then the day comes when Robert can no longer restrain his infatuation for the adventuress and as they walk on the beach he gathers her in his arms and asks her to go away with him. From the open window of the hotel Ruth witnesses the scene and the last thread that has held her life is broken. Before her lies the song which had inspired her husband to do the work that made him famous. She places it before her on the piano and in clear tones sings it through with all the feeling in her soul, the sounds reaching the pair on the beach and forcing Robert to draw away from the woman of the world. As the last note slowly drifts out of the window Ruth's head gently drops forward and her body droops upon the nearby table. Life has departed.

Universal May Erect Southern Studio

On July 25 the New Orleans Picayune carried the following news item in regard to the possibility of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company erecting a studio in that city:

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company very probably will begin the erection of a studio in New Orleans about October 1. Joe Brandt, special representative of the company, spent Friday in the city inspecting several proposed sites and generally investigating the advantages and disadvantages of New Orleans as a motion picture producing center. Mr. Brandt will go direct to New York, where he will make a favorable report on the proposal to establish the Universal's southern headquarters in this city.

Several of the principal motion picture producing companies have studios in Florida, and when the Universal company decided to invade the South, Jacksonville, Atlanta and New Orleans were the three cities given consideration. Mr. Brandt admitted Friday that New Orleans appeared to offer the most attractive advantages. If the city authorities of New Orleans pledge co-operation in the way of granting privileges for the use of the public parks, etc., Mr. Brandt believes the board of directors will approve his recommendations, and begin work on the New Orleans studio in the fall.

Screen Heroine Jumps From Hydroplane

Florence La Badie, "the actress unafraid," last week performed the most difficult scene her role in "The Million Dollar Mystery," Thanhouser's big serial has thus far called for, by leaping from a hydroplane, which was going at the rate of forty miles an hour. She was picked out of the water by James Cruze, her story hero, who arrived at the critical moment in a hydroaeroplane.

The scene was taken at Shippan Point, near Stamford, Conn., the cottagers and summer residents turning out to witness the young girl's daring. Asked as to the sensations she felt, as she hurled herself from the speeding hydroplane, Miss La Badie calmly commented: "I only remember I lost my breath when I struck the water. The rest of it was fine."

Close upon the heels of the announcement that several more Edison players had been secured the Universal Film Manufacturing Company closed contracts with Harry Meyers, Rosemary Theby and Brinsley Shaw of the Lubin Company on July 30. The trio are well known to followers of the "bell" brand of pictures and all have had very successful careers. Mr. Shaw is perhaps best known as the villain of the Broncho Billy pictures of the Essanay Company, with whom he was before he went to Lubin while Miss Theby formerly was leading lady for the Reliance and Vitagraph companies. Mr. Meyers has been leading man and director of his own company with Lubin about ten months and for some time previous to that played leading roles with the same firm. The new company to be formed for these stars will produce society dramas and comedies.

A Gripping Detective Story

Kathlyn Williams Featured

The fatal shot is heard.

THE release of the Selig Polyscope Company for August 17, entitled "The Speck on the Wall," is a detective story containing a decidedly novel idea and in which the air of mystery is so successfully worked up that until the beginning of the climax there appears to be no solution to the problem.

James Oliver Curwood, the author, has treated his subject in a masterful manner and the continuity of the scenes make the picture gripping and full of pathos, without a dull moment appearing during its full two thousand feet. The bulk of the acting falls upon the shoulders of the well known quartette of this company, Kathlyn Williams, Frank Clark, Wheeler Oakman and Charles Clary, and those who have seen their past performances know what kind of portrayals to expect from these sterling players.

Gaunt checks himself as he is about to warn St. John.

Miss Williams is superb in a role which calls for strong emotional acting while Mr. Clark and Mr. Clary are ideally fitted for their parts as a wealthy but unhappy gentleman of advanced years and his detective friend. Wheeler Oakman shows his versatility by assuming a heavy role.

The production has been put on with great care and many little touches of the human interest variety are noticeable throughout, which add greatly to its charm. The setting is in the social world and the background, both interior and exterior is carefully selected and clearly photographed. The majority of the story takes place at night but the tinting is well handled and the scenes clear. The "fade out" is used to good advantage in creating the mystery atmosphere and several "close up" views allow the actors an opportunity to register their emotions clearly.

As the story opens we find St. John, an elderly gentleman, and his young wife, Pauline, in a state of domestic unrest. He is devoted to her but she cares but little for him. He is too old to attend the social affairs she loves to go to and as a result she is forced to spend much of her time at home. Her husband's departure is a signal for her to call up Howland, an unscrupulous friend who, before her marriage, was Pauline's sweetheart and who still loves her.

The pair arrange an automobile ride and Howland hurries to her home. John Gaunt, a noted private detective, is strolling in one of the city parks when he sees them pass in the car and realizes that the wife of St. John, his dearest friend, is untrue to her husband. He is tempted to call up St. John at once and tell him, but he decides to wait as he feels it is not his place to interfere in the matter.

Later that day St. John calls upon Gaunt to invite him to a reception at his home the latter part of the week, an affair arranged by the unhappy husband especially to gratify his wife's desire for society. Gaunt accepts the invitation and again is tempted to tell his friend of his wife and the other man but once more he subdues his impulse and says nothing.

The night of the party arrives and Howland in his home takes a pistol from his desk and fires one bullet from it, apparently testing it. Then he hurries to the St. John home, arriving about the same time Gaunt does. The detective again sees the feeling existing between Mrs. St. John and Howland and while walking alone in the garden between dances he witnesses a passionate love scene between them but does not see the man slip Pauline two objects, the pistol and a cigar.

Pauline and Howland return to the house and, while Howland engages St. John in light conversation in the smoking room, the wife slips upstairs and un-almost getting the best when she meets her husband. However, she controls herself and when she joins the group St. John gladly slips away from Howland's company, which has bored him, and goes to his room for a smoke. Gaunt watching Pauline and Howland hears the man tell her that the time has arrived and sees her go to her husband's room. The detective wonders what the plan is but on the surface there appears no danger of anything more serious than an attempt to elope, which the detective has already decided to foil.

Alone with her husband Pauline shows great affection for him and even gives him the cigar to smoke which Howland had given her earlier in the evening. She then leaves him alone and returns to join Howland. Gaunt sees and determines that the time to prevent them from getting away has arrived so he joins them, much to their discomforture.

They make the best of it and are chatting with him when suddenly a shot is heard in the room above and a body falls to the floor. The guests are terrified and headed by Gaunt, Pauline and Howland all rush upstairs. St. John's dead body is found lying on the floor with a pistol by its side, one cartridge of which has been discharged.

Gaunt immediately takes charge of the affair and orders all of them to remain in the room while he secures the police. His telephone call brings the officers of the law in no time and Gaunt then sends everyone to the reception room where the police are told to watch them closely. Pauline leaves the room weeping and showing every sign of intense grief over the death of her husband.

When he is alone the detective works quickly and after examining the various things of the room discovers a strange speck on the wall. He cuts it from the wall paper and examines it closely. Then he tells the police to bring Pauline and Howland to him. The couple shrink with fear as they face him but the detective is stern.

Taking a cigar from a box one of the policemen had secured at a nearby store, he carefully lights it, looking at the two lovers all the time. The cigar has a hollow middle and after it has burned half way he holds the tube-like inside up to their view. Then, without warning he suddenly confronts them with his accusation that they are responsible for the death of St. John and that the means they used was a cigar such as the one he is smoking, loaded with a bullet. He tells them that the revolver placed at the side of the dead man was "planted" there by Pauline.

They recoil in terror and then both, realizing what they have done, try to escape only to be caught by the police. Gaunt orders them locked up and dismisses the guests. He then discovers he still holds in his hands the thing which was responsible for the capture of his friend's murderers, the speck of tobacco which was stuck onto the wall when the bullet within the cigar was exploded.

The cast is as follows:

Pauline	Kathlyn Williams
St. John	Frank Clark
Howland	Wheeler Oakman
John Gaunt	Charles Clary

Mutual Weekly to Cover Foreign War

Through its foreign connections the Mutual Weekly will be able to show on the screen each week the latest happenings taking place in Europe, should the great nations go to war. Just as soon as the rumbling of war was heard, cables were sent to Paris requesting the immediate shipment of pictures from the front and patrons of this pictorial news-film will be enabled to see actual battle-scenes from the cozy comfort of a theater seat and out of all danger of bursting shell.

Baseball Manager Plays Detective

John J. McGraw.

John J. McGraw, the scrappy manager of the New York Giants, and known to all baseball lovers as "the little Napoleon of the diamond," is soon to be seen on the screen as a regular actor. The Eclectic Company is planning to release, about the end of August, a film entitled "Detective Swift," with the veteran leader in the title role. A great many of the scenes of this play were taken during the late trip of the Giants and White Sox around the world. The play was written by Frank McGlynn, who accompanied the teams, and who directed the taking of the scenes on board the boat and in the foreign countries visited, and who also directed the studio scenes which were taken in Pathe Freres' plant.

Reporter Wins Hand of Heiress

Thrilling Auto Accident

UNLIKE the majority of present day stories "The Million Dollar Mystery" does not wait until the last chapter to unite its hero and heroine, for in episode seven Jim Norton proposes to and is accepted by the heiress, Florence Gray.

The installment shows how the conspirators again plan to kidnap the heiress, and how this time they meet with a terrible accident, which sends three of them to apparent death. It is entitled "The Doom of the Auto Bandits."

While the main punch of these two reels lies in the scene in which the auto is dashed into the river when it becomes uncontrollable at the ferry landing, there is also a strong feeling of heart interest noticeable throughout and the love scenes are very prettily staged.

The scenery along the river road and in the crowded streets of New York City is appealing, while the interior sets continue to be of the finest quality. The acting is even more human than it has been, the work of James Cruze and Florence La Badie being especially worthy of mention.

The film serves to introduce a few notables, this being done without breaking into the general trend of the story. Among those who appear for the first time as "picture actors" is the celebrated Duke of Manchester, who handles himself as though appearing before the camera was a daily occurrence with him.

As the picture opens we find the conspirators, angry at their failure to capture Florence, planning a far more desperate scheme to get the girl into their power. The countess is again responsible for the plan they adopt and all set to work to perfect the details of the venture.

Jim comes to call on Florence and brings some candy with him. While no word of love has ever passed between them, both know that they are devoted to each other and their greatest delight is to be together. As they eat the candy together in the parlor one of the conspirators sneaks up to the house, determined to learn what he can about the route of the heiress' early morning rides and after bribing the groom he learns that she always takes the road along the river, one which is seldom used and which the conspirator decides would be an ideal spot for them to trap her. He hurries back to his confederates with this information.

The rescue of Florence by Jim Norton.

Jim and Florence are gradually drawn together as they talk, and at last he folds her in his arms and tells her of the love he has felt for her ever since they have been linked together by the strange adventures which continually surround them. Happily Florence lifts her face to his and tells him that she returns his love and that she will be his wife.

In the meantime the conspirators have been busy and the plot to kidnap the heiress has been perfected. One of their number is to disguise himself as an old man, while several more are to wait in an automobile and be ready to get away as soon as Florence has been secured. They decide, however, that the next day will be the best time to get her.

The next morning Florence starts off on her ride as usual, feeling very happy because of her engagement to Jim. The conspirators seek the most secluded spot they can find on the river road and lie in wait for her. When they see her approaching they suddenly realize that if she sees so many of them she will be certain to suspect that something is wrong, so all get into the auto, with the exception of the one disguised as the old man, and go to a nearby inn.

The supposed old man feigns illness as Florence approaches him, and her tender heart is touched, so she dismounts and goes to his aid. He quickly jumps to his feet, drives her horse down the road and drags the struggling girl with him to an old hut where another of their band has been placed for just such an emergency. He leaves Florence here with the other ruffian and departs to get his friends and the automobile.

Jim's first thought that morning is of the little girl that has promised to be his bride, and his first act is to hurry to a jewelry store and secure a ring for her. He then goes to her home but learns from Jones, the butler, that she is out for her ride. After waiting a few minutes he decides to go and meet her, and starts out along the river road. He has not gone far, however, when he sees her horse dashing wildly down the road without its rider, and he knows that something must have happened to her.

Putting full speed on, he drives down the road, looking to all sides for some clue that would lead to his finding her, but none can be seen until he suddenly comes upon some flowers he had given her the day before. He leaves his car and follows the direction the conspirator had dragged her, the broken underbrush, her dropped whip and her hat serving to lead him to the old hut.

Florence tries in many ways to escape from her captor, but her efforts only amuse him. When she pleads with him he roughly shoves her to the side of the room, this happening just as Jim looks in the window. The reporter flares into anger as he sees the act, and before the conspirator realizes what is happening he finds himself sprawling on the floor with Jim standing over him, Florence's lover having climbed in through the window.

Jim then takes Florence in his protecting arms and the two hurry from the hut and get into the waiting auto of the newspaper man. The other conspirators in the meantime have delayed their return, but finally come back to get their victim only to find their fallen comrade and learn from him the story of the girl's rescue.

They hurriedly take up the pursuit in their auto and soon are in sight of the little car which carries Florence and Jim. The two automobiles dash through the streets of New York, first one gaining, then the other. Slowly but surely the pursuing car creeps up on the other one, and Jim sees that it is now a matter of life or death, and while he steers his machine with one hand he whips his pistol from his pocket with the other and fires over his shoulder. The bullet goes true and hits a vital spot in the machinery of the conspirators' car. The machine lurches to the side and the man at the wheel can do nothing with it.

Almost at the same moment they sweep around a curve and both drivers see before them the open ferry landing. Jim throws on the breaks and stops his little car at the edge of the platform but the other car, now uncontrollable, dashes wildly into the river, carrying the conspirators with it.

Florence recoils in horror at the sight and Jim hastens her away from the scene of the tragedy. They arrive at her home and before he leaves her to go to his work he slips the engagement ring on her finger, and tells her that now no one can doubt his right to protect her.

Uses Gloves to Register Emotion

Edward Brennan.

Did you ever give thought to the possible—nay, probable—trials and tribulations of the actor who has to play a "mystery" part in a film serial? Not one of those rough and tumble, Desperate Desmond parts, either, though he does have to prove himself — right before the camera, too—pretty active with his fists, but a refined, well groomed man of the world type of a "mysterious" person.

"Here's the difficulty of this mystery business," Edward Brennan (his name in "Our Mutual Girl" series is Howard Dunbar) said recently: "If a man who has to play such a part could utilize the conventional 'drop them papers or you're a dead man' kind of stuff it would be easy. But when you have to maintain dignity and poise, be at once a man under suspicion of underworld connections and prove you have Fifth avenue acquaintanceships and clothes—it's a regular job.

"I learned that if there are ninety odd emotions I could 'register' about one more than that number by making effective display of my kid, suede or chamois gloves. It has been an invaluable lesson to me in my film work. Because if a pair of gloves can be made as eloquent as mine have become on the screen there is a splendid field for utilizing other parts of one's garb for a similar purpose."

By the Goat Man

PERISH the thought that it is dull in New York's film rialto. The activity is everywhere apparent—after sun down. Group after group are buzzing around at night, flitting here and there, listening to this proposition and that. Programs, programs, programs. It is all that is talked about. If you can't think in millions you simply don't belong. Everybody figures on a program. The little fellows who have one fairly acceptable film all get together in one bunch and try to amalgamate their interests. They dream about their program. The manufacturer who has an indifferent outlet for a portion of his reels is ready to join any sensible proposition that will help to increase his factory output. He wants his program. The business office may be desolate during the day, but the boss is busy at night. Midnight sessions are common occurrences. Out of it all will come some dope sheets warranted to make us gasp for breath.

* * *

The stumbling block is distribution of reels. The program schemers must have an outlet and the branch exchanges give them great concern. The exchange men of this country hold the balance of power. Money has gone crazy to engage in film manufacture, but money hasn't been interested to any great extent in film distribution. The exchange men of the country—those who are partially independent of present-day programs—are ready to consider the best offers. They are necessary to any new program venture. Some day the functions of exchange men will be better understood. It is comparatively easy to make a new program when reckoned with the more difficult problem of its distribution. The exchange is vital. It should belong to the successful manufacturer or group of manufacturers behind the program, just as it has belonged to them thus far. The great trouble with the exchange system now employed is its reluctance to buy sufficient films to satisfy the early demands made for them. The manufacturer of films should find his largest profit in the making of films—positive prints at so much per foot. In the good old days when the mills turned out a single negative a week, it was all in the day's work to sell from eighty to a hundred prints. Nowadays, when six or more subjects go out every week, the orders for positives rarely attain forty. The big money isn't in manufacture. The greater profit lies in distribution. The method itself is wide-open to criticism.

Any one who will have need for a film exchange must realize, first of all, that the exchange is a depository for films. To establish a new string of exchanges throughout the country means the storing of thousands of new reels. A reel of film costs $100 or more. Every exchange customer requires three or more reels per day. Every exchange customer ties up $300 or more every day. One hundred customers—the number estimated to make film renting a satisfactory business—means investment of from $30,000 to $50,000 for that one day. You must buy more new subjects for tomorrow! A string of exchanges with facilities to meet exhibitors' exacting demands makes a million dollars look sick. And yet there are groups of men in New York who are planning whole programs and new exchanges for the country—doing it with an abandon that startles. Out of it all will come brand new combinations. The old programs are bound to have some competition and before the snow flies.

I promised to tell you about my visit with David Horsley. Bayonne is a suburb of Jersey City—the capital of the peninsular point that separates Newark and New York bays. It might have become a part of Staten Island except for the Kill van Kull. It is accessible to New York City via subway, ferry and the Central Ry. of New Jersey, and when all are employed you can make it from the Horsley office in the Mecca building to the Horsley office at the Bayonne studio and factory in less than an hour. Chester Beecroft acted as guide and purser during the outward trip. I managed to get back all by my lonesome, although I ran across Mabel Greene, enroute. She was carrying Wen Milligan's credentials!

* * *

Dave Horsley was in. The plant he occupies is a new, re-inforced steel and concrete building of goodly proportions, the studio surmounting the factory and all equipped with modern film-making machines and accessories. I had expected to find such a plant, but I was surprised to find it in operation. The announcements had gone out that Horsley would make a comedy a day and that he was engaged in making "Il Trovatore"—a spectacular, long-length feature, but that had not conveyed to me that his mill would be running. It was, however. All the wheels were going around and around with a ship-shape that implied long practice. Horsley is the actual manufacturer of a big portion of the Universal program, besides doing a large share of commercial work for other interests. His plans have not been fully determined. The idea of a comedy a day has brought him an overwhelming demand but the problem of distribution has him guessing. "Il Trovatore" is in the making. The day I saw Mr. Horsley, two companies were out in the woods doing exteriors in the big piece and the studio was all cluttered up with interior sets. I missed seeing Charlie Simone, but I saw his footprints.

* * *

Dave Horsley upsets all precedents among the film men. He is never in a hurry. The day was hot and sultry, but it didn't ruffle a hair of Dave's head. He didn't seem to mind the weather. He had lots of time for me; excused himself when the telephone interrupted; excused the stenographer while I was present. He didn't yell into the telephone to "put 'em on the other wire" and make a dive out of the room. Horsley plays his cards right out on the table. If he has any secrets they must be locked up at home. He goes right along in a quiet, peaceful way; putting in his time at the plant office. He is living down the Jersey Coast this summer and seldom gets over to New York. When his New York office wants him, it finds him in Bayonne. Dave Horsley has made his money in films. It is the thing he knows; the thing he enjoys. He has found a way to keep the wheels turning and when the film mills grind, there is always something registered on the speedometer. ¶Dave Horsley made his cash killing a little more than a year ago when Carl Laemmle broke down an automobile carting Dave's coin into Bayonne. Since then Dave Horsley's check is good for the amount he writes upon it. The days of old were nothing like these. When I visited Horsley at Bayonne on a previous occasion I found altogether different conditions, but I found the same smiling David Horsley—the man who never shows excitement.

* * *

About the works are many of the Horsley inventions—practical devices employed to facilitate the Horsley plans. No one ever seems to know when Dave Horsley finds time to do stunts on the side, but I fancy he slips about in the night. ¶I missed Big

Earle Williams and Lillian Walker in Vitagraph's "Lily of the Valley."

Brother Bill and I noticed that the flower gardens were also missing him. Bill is out at Universal City in California. He ships the stuff to Dave. All of which goes to show that when you are a film man you belong to the fraternity that travels with both feet along the path that is strewn with clearing-house checks.

* * *

Programs—new ones—are all the fashion. That there are serious minds employed with new programs, cast your eyes over these printed pages until you find a picture of the new Willat Studios and Laboratories. You get a glimpse of a portion of the plant that has been carved out of the raw and which will undertake the making of an entirely new program. There are two great studios, each fifty by one hundred feet, embodying every new wrinkle that ingenuity might suggest. In the center of each is a great tank to be used when occasion demands. The factory, lying off there to the rear is of modern construction throughout—full three stories and equipped to handle 3,000,000 feet of films on the easy shift. That tremendous tank is part of a sprinkling system which brings the insurance rate down to a minimum and it also supplies the water supply for the developing rooms. The experience of years and years crops out all over this tremendous new plant, just ready to engage in film manufacture.

* * *

is at Fort Lee, N. J. The campus occupies four and a half acres in the residential district—several of the homes are still tenanted. These are to give way to two more studios identical with those now completed and the plans of this concern contemplate working as many as forty-eight sets at a time!

* * *

An undertaking of these proportions is not the result of this evening's dream over your coffee, wondering who will pay the check. Charles O. Baumann and C. A. Willat have been engaged in building this great plant for many months. It will become the home of the Popular Photo Plays Corporation with offices in the Longacre Building, New York. Messrs. Baumann and Willat need no introduction to film folks. They have long been identified with all phases of film production and manufacture. The announcements they will have for the trade will command instant attention and respect. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have already been spent in their enterprises and it is merely a matter of a few weeks when they will speak for themselves.

It was my good fortune to receive an invitation to inspect the Fort Lee Willat Studios' property and improvements. The party included Messrs. Willat, Baumann, Kessel, Ince and Sennett and several representatives of the press. The trip was made in automobiles, via 129th street ferry. The return included a luncheon in the vicinity of Columbus Circle. That the impression of serious work was stamped upon us all may be taken for granted. They are thinking and acting on the subject of new programs in New York. Here is real proof.

* * *

Before he sailed for the "theater of war," I visited H. O. Bodine, of Raw Film Supply Company. Mr. Bodine will visit the European factories of his concern to study the details of film manufacture; its handling, and include the subject of photography as well. He expects to visit France, Belgium, Germany and Italy. Italy being neutral ground with the highest mountains, Bodine may have to confine himself to that one country, using a field glass for close inspection.

Wid Gunning has sent me a lot of stuff from Beaufort, Kerry, Ireland, including a sample of his whiskers. Wid makes no comment on the war. He talks Sid Olcott like a poll parrot and says he finds MOTOGRAPHY more interesting than a letter from his best "goil."

Maine woods. Her orders were to keep on going till the word "fil-lum" ceased to reverberate on her tired brain-cap. A card from Naples says she has found the spot and that fishing, bathing, boating, tennis and golf are the only recreations. Gosh, and me on a desolate island with a sore spot on my neck where I can't get at it!

pany is rambling about in the continental war zone and nobody knows where to find him. His brother Gus has rushed into the publicity department, cable division, in an effort to locate the Colonel. Why "Cabiria" is Supreme

"Cabiria" was produced without regard to expense and over one year was expended in completing the production ready for the market.

The world's largest and finest theaters threw open their doors to "Cabiria" and the public flocked to view its wonders at prices no lower than those charged for high class theatrical attractions. Two dollars seems an exorbitant price to pay for a seat, yet "Cabiria" has many hundreds of patrons to its credit who have paid that sum per seat and went away sounding its praises.

"Cabiria" is the only film spectacle ever shown at the White House to the President of the United States, members of the President's Cabinet, and their wives. This occurred on Friday, June 26, under the personal direction of Augustus Thomas, a friend of both the President and Harry R. Raver, who is directing the American tour of the spectacle. Manuel Klein, the famous New York Hippodrome composer, arranged special piano music for the film and personally went to Washington for Mr. Raver to play the incidental music for the presentation at the White House.

"Cabiria" holds the world's record for box office receipts for one week over all other single film productions shown without other attractions on the same program. This was established at the Knickerbocker Theater during the week of June 8, 1914, when over 21,000 persons paid from 25 cents to $2.00 each to see the exhibition.

Gabriel D'Annunzio not only wrote the scenario, but actively collaborated in the work of production. D'Annunzio is a man rated among the world's greatest thinkers. This is the first time that a man of his mental caliber has seriously devoted himself to motion pictures.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.

HOWEVER deplorable and even inexcusable a general European war may appear to us, with its inevitable wholesale annihilation of lives and property, it is with its business aspect that we must most directly concern ourselves. We are confronted with the fact that many of the most prominent factors in the film industry derive their supply of pictures from Europe, and that many of the large American film manufacturers are dependent upon European markets for a considerable portion of their profits.

To the American exhibitor, of course, the condition is not especially serious. There are plenty of American-made films for his program, and if perhaps he is deprived of some of his favorites, he can nevertheless adapt his show to the circumstances.

Even the importer of foreign films, if he is lucky, may not be especially hard hit. Most of the big European studios will doubtless continue to operate in any event short of actual devastation of their countries. And even if the studios should become inoperative, the camera man-war correspondent will be on the job all the time, recording actual history of a type more dramatic than any drama. And there will be no question of the acceptability of the war films. No studio picture ever produced will have the drawing power of these mightiest of topicals.

So we need have little fear that there will be an ample supply of foreign subjects to continue their present programs and even establish new ones—if we can get them over here. It is a question of transportation—and a question that no one can answer right now. But we are not prepared to admit there is any commercial problem that the film interests cannot solve. We will get the pictures, even if some adventurous agent has to run blockade with a cargo of reels.

The most serious aspect of the situation is the closing of the European market to American films; for the closing of European ports and the mental perturbation of the people seem to promise little hope of even a limited demand for American pictures, or indeed any pictures at all except those war-topicals which mean even more to them than they do to us.

Those American manufacturers who are relying largely on European trade will find their greatest hope for a continuation of normal business in the possibility of American demand and supply striking a balance. By this we mean that if the supply of European-made subjects should be curtailed, their place on our programs would have to be filled with American-made subjects. Then the augmented demand for American pictures at home would do much to console the manufacturer for his temporary loss of European trade.

There is, too, the further possibility that American exhibitors who lose the European part of their programs may become converts to a straight American program. Practically all importers of European subjects are prepared to manufacture in this country if necessary; and while the necessity may not materialize, they will probably put their plants in order and fore-arm themselves against possible loss.

LIQUOR AND CENSORSHIP.

FOR editorial material the subject of censorship is inexhaustible. It is always live and important, and is apt to continue so for some time to come. For that reason the topic is beloved of editors, who, in their pursuit of it, become liable to the suspicion of using it to fill in with when short of other material.

But it is our own opinion that too much cannot be said about, or against, censorship, provided that the issue is not clouded by mere verbosity.

The specific example of censorship that interests us just now is the action of the Pennsylvania State Board of Censorship in rejecting the film entitled "John Barleycorn"—the picture version of Jack London's already famous book.

Now, this opinion of ours is not intended as an appreciation of Jack London, a brief for the producer of the film, or a tract on the evils of the liquor habit. The work first appeared as a serial in the Saturday Evening Post, where it had a very wide reading, augmented later by its publication between covers. London is always readable. He is not always pleasant reading, however; and naked drink is not a pleasant subject for any writer—except possibly Omar Khayyam. But perhaps its very unpleasantness is its strength in this case; for there can be no question that London has presented, without a suspicion of melodrama, an intimate story of booze whose every influence must necessarily be against the liquor traffic. Not even those defective and immature minds, whose existence forms so favored an argument with the picture reformers, could find any suggestion but one of repulsion in the story.

The picture "John Barleycorn," therefore, is ideal as an uplift or moral subject, because it presents vice interestingly enough to gain an audience and repulsively enough to turn the audience against it. Whether exhibitors have found or will find it a profitable show need not enter into this discussion. We are concerned only with its moral significance, and its approval by various anti-saloon organizations and the attacks made upon it by liquor interests show that those interested and expert parties at least regard it as an effective deterrent to the consumption of alcoholic beverages.

One might imagine that such a subject would be approved with joy by any censor board, regardless of whether exhibitors wanted it or not. But the ways of censorship are subtle and devious and not to be understood by mortal man. Yet all things must have a reason, however obscure. We would not for the world allow ourselves to think that an anti-liquor picture was rejected because the liquor interests did not like it!

STILL PICTURES.

IN one of the great eastern studios is conspicuously posted a sign reading to the effect that a prize of ten dollars will be given for the best still picture taken to illustrate any film being produced in that studio. The still pictures emanating from that source are of very good photographic quality; but aside from that it is difficult to see any marked superiority over the "stills" coming from any other first-class company.

Still pictures are becoming of constantly greater importance. As trade paper illustrations and theater lobby displays they were vital enough; but now that practically all the big newspapers have entered the field and are presenting film news to the whole population of the country, the still is an absolute necessity. It follows then that good stills are as essential today as good films.

The average still picture is taken by grouping the players after a scene with an eye to the best general effect, regardless of any fidelity to the action of the film. It is by no means uncommon to see a still depicting a scene which has absolutely no counterpart in the film. Strained attitudes and expressions, due to holding for the convenience of the still photographer, are almost the rule. Frequently some part of the make-up or costume has become disarranged, and is not readjusted for the hastily posed still. To summarize all this, present still pictures, while not bad, could be better, and therefore should be better.

The requirements for taking better stills appear to be comparatively simple. The principal one is a camera with a good rapid lens and shutter, capable of picking out scenes from the regular action while the motion picture camera is working. It should be so mounted that its field is practically identical with that of the motion camera. It might even be mounted on top of the latter, with a cord shutter release that the camera-man himself could work with his left hand or his foot. He would soon become expert at picking out the strong scenes in the play, and the resulting stills would certainly show more life and fidelity and less artificiality than they do at present. Where two cameras were working it would pay to have both of them equipped with still attachments. In ordinary practice this would give one still exposure for each scene of the film, and the still camera would be reset each time the camera man stopped.

Any camera-man, or, at least, any producer, is ingenious enough to work out the details of such an arrangement without further description. The thing is to realize the importance of doing it. Today films are sold all the way through the commercial chain down to the public by means of still pictures. The still is the advance agent of the film, and it is responsible for the impression that interests the consumer, whoever he may be. The best still pictures possible are surely none too good for this responsibility.

MORE UNIVERSAL COMEDIES.

Henry Pathe Lehrman, erstwhile director of the inimitable Ford Sterling and formerly Mr. Sterling's director with the Keystone Company, took up his duties as supervising director for three comedy companies at the Pacific Coast studios of the Universal this week. The products of which will be released under the brand-name "L. K. O.", meaning "Lehrman Company."

Mr. Lehrman brought with him from New York three well-known stars, who will play the leading roles in his first company. They are Billie Ritchie, English comedian; Henry Bergman, well-known character man, and Gertrude Selby, famous as a vaudeville artist.

Another of Harold MacGrath's stories of the Orient, "The Carpet of Bagdad," is being produced by the Selig Polyscope Company in its western studios. Kathlyn Williams again has the leading role, one which is said to fit her as well as "Kathlyn" did, and Colin Campbell is the producer. Several street scenes in Cairo will be shown.

An "Inceograph" sandwich is the newest complication in Philadelphia culinary circles. Its creation was brought about at a midnight luncheon of John E. Ince, who, together with the chef, is exclusively enjoying the secret morsel's recipe.

Mountain Maid Shames Revenue Officer

Illicit Still Spared

WONDERFULLY picturesque backgrounds, woodland scenes of surpassing beauty, and long tree-lined vistas make American's release of Monday, August 10, entitled "The Trap," a picture of exceptional character.

The story is written around a little colony of moonshiners in the Kentucky mountains and the attempts of Wilson Allen, of the United States secret service, to secure the evidence necessary to convict the mountaineers. William Garwood, Vivian Rich, Harry Von Meter, Jack Richardson, Louise Lester and other "Flying A" favorites depict on the screen the quaint characters of the Kentucky hills, and so excellently do they perform that one can almost believe he is beholding a little slice of life taken from the daily lives of the real moonshiners.

Vivian Rich as Nan.

The action of the photoplay moves steadily along to the big climax of the second reel, in which we see Jack Richardson, as Bud Scott, lying in wait at the head of a mountain pass for the coming of the revenue officer, whose business in the hills has been discovered. It is Bud's intention to kill the man in cold blood, and one is held spellbound as he awaits the coming of Billy Garwood, who plays the role of the secret service man, and whom we know to be on the way through the hills and certain to pass near the point at which Richardson lies concealed.

At the beginning of reel one we learn that old Buck Sage and his two grown sons are operating a moonshine distillery in the Kentucky mountains. Vivian Rich appears as Nan Sage, a wild, ignorant, mischievous girl of the hills, and it is she who furnishes the love element which serves to make the photoplay doubly interesting. One day Nan is insulted by her cousin Hank, and Bud Scott, who is in love with her, makes it his business to avenge the insult by knocking Hank down. In revenge Hank determines to turn traitor and to reveal to the government sleuths the location of the illicit still Wilson Allen, a young and good looking revenue officer, is ordered into the Kentucky mountains by his superiors to obtain the necessary evidence for convicting the mountaineers after the still is discovered and its owners arrested. Allen arranges to impersonate a fugitive from justice, and with the assistance of another secret service man immediately puts his plan into operation.

One day while Buck Sage and his sons are standing near their cabin, Allen comes rushing up, out of breath, his clothing torn and dirtied, and a pair of handcuffs attached to his wrists. He gasps out a story of his escape from the officer who had arrested him, and asks the Sages to hide him until pursuit is over. Old Buck is inclined to doubt Allen's story, but eventually he permits him to hide within the cabin, and a few moments later, when the other revenue men appear and ask regarding the passing of Allen, old man Sage tells them that the escaping prisoner passed some minutes before, and indicates by a wave of his hand the direction taken.

The revenue men hasten away apparently on the trail of the escaped prisoner, but inwardly smiling to themselves over the clever way in which Allen, their companion, has managed to win his way into the condence of the moonshiners.

Allen meanwhile has encountered Nan Sage and made friends with her. Old Buck Sage has informed him that he can stay with them for awhile, and everything looks promising for an early completion of his business in the mountains. Crafty though Allen has been in his plans for remaining with the Sages, he finds as time passes that the mountaineers are carefully guarding the hiding place of the still, and that he is no nearer the end of his task than on the day he arrived.

The pleasing manners and good looks of the revenue man make a strong impression on Nan, and Allen finds himself thinking more and more of the girl as her character unfolds and develops before his keen eyes. This friendship grows more and more to resemble love as time passes, and one day while Allen and Nan are in the hills they come upon a demijohn of whisky which has been left beside the trail. Allen laughingly remarks that he knows a still is being operated by the Sages, but that nobody trusts him enough to show him where it is. He then proceeds to make a test of Nan's affection for him, and the girl easily falls a victim to his wiles and agrees to show him the still if he'll promise "to never tell."

Having obtained the information he seeks, Allen proceeds to immediately write a letter to his superior officer, reporting in detail the result of his discoveries and urging a prompt raid by the government men. This letter is entrusted to a small boy to mail, but the lad chances to meet Sage and his sons on the trail and the letter receives their attention. As none of the mountaineers can read the boy suggests taking the letter to his old "Aunt Liz," who can read "some." The suggestion is immediately acted upon and the moonshiners learn with surprise that the guest within their cabin is a hated "revenuer."

Outside the cabin of the old woman who can read Nan overhears the reading of the note and is heartbroken by the discovery that her lover is a secret service man. Her grief quickly changes to vindictive hatred and she readily agrees to lure the revenue man to his death in a manner suggested by Bud Scott. Bud is to lie in wait in a certain mountain pass, and when the revenue man passes on the trail below, shoot him.

Bud conceals himself and awaits the coming of Allen. Nan meanwhile finds that the passage of time has cooled her anger and eventually her love for Allen begins to overcome her desire for vengeance. The girl happens to be wearing Allen's hat, which she has taken from him in a spirit of mischief, and when she suddenly determines to warn her lover of the fate awaiting him and thus prevent his death, she goes hurrying through the woods to find him ere Bud can end his life, forgetting all about the hidden man in the ambush above. Bud sees the moving hat and believes of course that it is Allen being lured to his doom. Bud takes careful aim, pulls the trigger, and a moment later Nan lies a lifeless little heap in the brush below.

Bud returns home to report that he has "settled the revenuer," and it is only hours afterwards that the Sages discover the real tragedy of the mountains.

Allen on his way to keep his appointment with Nan comes upon the lifeless form of the little maid, and filled with pity, remorse and shame over the unexpected result of his double dealing, he returns to the city, downcast and regretful, and reports to his superiors that his mission has been unsuccessful.

The cast is as follows:

Wilson Allen, of the secret service.....Wm. Garwood
Nan Sage, of the hills.....Vivian Rich
Franklin Sage, a moonshiner.....Harry Von Meter
Budd Scott, of the hils.....Jack Richardson
Eliza Hunt.....Louise Lester

Ben Wilson Joins Universal

Ben Wilson.

The Universal Company has signed Ben Wilson, one of the popular leading men of filmdom, to direct and appear in his own plays, to be released probably under the Victor brand. For three years Mr. Wilson has been connected with the Edison Company playing leads. Within the past year he has directed many pictures, several of them written by and featuring himself. With a commanding physique, a handsome face, and the perfect poise of a thoroughly trained artist, he typifies the best in leading men. Probably the most successful, and certainly the most recent appearance of Mr. Wilson, was in the "Cleek" series of detective dramas. He essayed the title role and the last two of them he directed himself. Other pictures, all of them two and three reel length, which Mr. Wilson has not only written and directed himself, but also played leads in are: "The Shattered Tree," "Mother and Wife," "When Cartridges Failed," and "While the Tide Was Raising." Such features as "An American King," "The Brass Bowl" role. In the last named feature Mr. Wilson played seven distinctive parts.

He was born in Corning, Iowa, and he is still a young man. However, for fourteen years he was on the legitimate stage, starting from the time when he scampered off, hardly more than a boy, to join a brass band road show up to that period where he was one of the most sought after leading men for stock companies and spent much of his time with Broadway hits. He created the role of "Boss" in "The Governor and the Boss," which played at the Lincoln Theater.

Strong Picture of Civil War

Lew Dockstader Appears

FEW themes offer the opportunity for the direct and stirring appeal that is aroused by dramas founded on the incidents of the Civil War. Patriotic impulse may be the answer but it matters not whether the North or South is favored in the characters if the dramatic situations and climaxes are properly interpreted and the picture well presented it never fails to become popular.

It is this theme that forms the base for the All Star Feature Corporation's latest production, "Dan," a five part story with a powerful heart interest appeal which is brought out in strong contrast by Lew Dockstader's humorous characterization of Dan, an old family servant whose long years of service authorize him to assume much evident and ludicrous responsibility in the family's welfare. Mr. Dockstader is at all times interesting and entertaining, one cannot see too much of him. Most of the time he is distributing the humor which has made his name world-wide as a minstrel, but in few instances his simple-hearted endeavors to be comforting and helpful are truly pathetic in their sincerity.

The scenic background of the picture is wonderfully rich in beautiful wooded scenes, shaded streams and luxuriant foliage. The house representing the southern mansion is a well-kept, comfortable looking home built on the colonial style and fits into the story well. There is but one battle in the picture and it is purely incidental and is short but full of action.

An able cast is seen in support of Mr. Dockstader, among whom are Gail Kane as Grace Dabney; W. D. Fishter as John Hammond; George Cowl as Raoul Dabney; Hal Reid, the author, as Colonel Dabney and Lois Meredith as his daughter, Lila; Beatrice Clevenger as Elsie Hammond; William Conklin as Jonas Watts; and John H. Pratt as Stonewall Jackson.

John Hammond and his sister, Elsie, pay a visit to their southern friends, the Dabneys. While there John becomes engaged to Colonel Dabney's daughter Grace, and Raoul Dabney becomes engaged to John's sister, Elsie. Shortly afterward war is declared and the Hammond's terminate their visit and return North. With the call to arms John is appointed lieutenant in the Union army and Raoul becomes a lieutenant in his father's Confederate command.

The parting of the Hammonds and Dabneys.

On their first official errands after the beginning of hostilities the boys meet, talk together for a few moments and separate. Their next meeting is under greatly different circumstances. While in the neighborhood of the Dabney home John decides to visit Grace. Arriving at the house he surprises Jonas Watts, formerly the Dabneys' overseer, in the act of arresting Grace as a spy. He prevents this act of vengeance, but immediately afterward is forced to arrest her brother who, while on scouting duty, has dropped in to pay a visit to his sisters.

the scene, stays the execution and promises to take the case to Richmond.

Word arrives at home that Colonel Dabney has been shot, and Dan leaves for the camp to nurse his master. His health improved the colonel resumes command of his troops, and later on, in an ambush attack is killed and the body sent home with old Dan as the guard of honor.

The faithful servant makes his way back to the front, enters Raoul's guard tent, and induces him to exchange clothes with him, blacken his face and make his escape. When it is discovered that young Dabney has escaped, old Dan is executed for effecting his release.

Shortly afterward the war ends, and Raoul and John return to the Dabney homestead where, with Grace and Elsie, the horrible incidents connected with the war are forgotten and a happy married life begun.

Pictures Rule Chicago's Lake Front

The approach of the fall theatrical season finds the theaters which line the lake front of Chicago still devoted to motion pictures and still drawing crowds which would do justice to any successful legitimate attraction.

The past few months have seen the Windy City show houses almost entirely devoted to dramas and comedies of the screen but at the present time several places in the loop which have returned to legitimate attractions. This does not mean, however, that pictures are beginning to slip but rather has served as a contrast, as the difference between the business done by the legit theaters which run but one show a day and the houses devoted to features films and running continuous from noon until 11 p. m. easily shows the preference of the Chicago people for the latter.

At the Ziegfeld Theater "Brewster's Millions," the great comedy feature adapted from the book by George Barr McCutcheon holds sway and continues to draw the same sized crowds it attracted when it was first put on. Orchestra Hall which recently completed a showing of "John Barleycorn," Jack London's powerful story, is now running Eugene Walter's Canadian story "The Wolf." Annette Kellerman in "Neptune's Daughter," which is enjoying the longest run of any film in Chicago, is the attraction at the Fine Arts Theater.

Next door, at the Studebaker, the theater which was the home of "The Spoilers" for so long, "The Littlest Rebel," the screen adaption of the Photo Film Company of America from Edward Peple's great play of the Civil War, is filling the house every night. The latter play, which was staged on the southern battlefields, abounds in appealing situations and thrilling battle scenes and the backgrounds are little short of marvelous. E. K. Lincoln, the former Vitagraph star, has the lead in the production and his acting is deserving of great praise. This film also is of interest to those who follow army methods as some of the most realistic battle scenes ever shown on the screen are incorporated into it.

Aged Scout to Cross Continent

Scout William H. Taylor, aged 86 years, Indian fighter, grizzled veteran of the plains and at present an expert on frontier craft in the employ of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, left Los Angeles on a 4,000 mile journey to New York, July 31, after delivering an address at a banquet given in his honor by the members of the Los Angeles Rotary Club.

The veteran scout stated that this was to be his last trip across the country and told of his previous trips and the various conditions under which they were made. He paid a high tribute to the business men of Los Angeles and addressed his appreciation to Isadore Bernstein, through whose activity he was the honored guest of the occasion. As he departed he was given a rousing send-off by a hundred members of the club, who gathered on the sidewalk in front of the Alexandria hotel.

His departure from the Universal studios at Hollywood showed the appreciation his fellow employes felt for the white-haired old man who has undertaken to ride 4,000 miles to New York, that he may re-travel the trails of his youth and behold the scenes of his useful activity for the last time. He carries with him a letter from the Pacific Coast studios to President Carl Laemmle and a letter from the Los Angeles Rotary Club to all the Rotary clubs along his line of travel. The old scout will also stop at the Universal exchanges and theaters.

By Mabel Condon

Kate Price.

"DON'T expect me to say anything," warned Kate Price one afternoon recently when I found her enjoying a rocker and a book in her dressing-room at the Vitagraph Theater. It was with a typical Kate Price laugh that she then explained: "I put my foot in my mouth every time I open it, and I can't tell you any pretty tales to make a story out of; all I can do is tell you the truth.

"That's my failing," she bemoaned. "I have to tell the truth, no matter what. I'm right out with it, whatever it is; and Mary Charleston is the same. She's my cousin, though she calls me aunt because I look more like an aunt than a cousin. She tells people she was born in Ireland. She's just like me, that way; she has to tell the truth. I was born in the city of Cork and came over to this country when I was a big girl. There were other relatives with me and we settled in Rhode Island. I went to school there for two years and then went to work in the thread mills. It was then that I became interested in theatricals, for there was an amateur theatrical club that I joined and people told me I was wasting my time in the mills.

"It's the comical roles that I've always liked to play," went on Kate, putting a smile into the telling. Then the smile disappeared and Kate Price said: "It was during one of those amateur plays that I met me husband—that was twenty-two years ago. We were married eighteen years and two months and were never separated in our work until he was taken ill and wasn't able to do anything.

"Well," she resumed with a sigh, "it was he who put me on the stage. He took me into vaudeville with him and our team name was 'Price and Steele.' Several times we left vaudeville for stock or a melodramatic engagement. I remember we opened in Chicago at the old Hopkins Theater in 'Her First False Step.' I created the part of the Irish wash-woman. We played together, my husband and I, always. Then four years ago he became ill and I stayed and took care of him until our funds were nearly gone. I didn't know what we would do when they were gone and I was pretending to my husband, right along, that we weren't badly off at all.

"One day somebody said to me, 'Kate, why don't you go to the Vitagraph studio and see if they couldn't use you?' So I went and three days after I applied, they called me on a picture. It was 'Jack Fat and Jim Slim at Coney Island'—and if you want to know how really funny it was, just ask Fred Thompson; he directed it." At the memory, the Price laugh that is guaranteed to cheer, sounded heartily and Kate deserted the rocker and pictured the slides and rolls and falls they took during the sight-seeing visit of "Jack Fat and Jim Slim."

"We put one chute out of working order," related Kate, "and I did everything I was told to do. I weighed two hundred and twenty then; that's ten pounds more than I am now, and I had to do all the things first, and the others flying after me would all land on me.

"Well, I was black and blue for months. My husband was in the hospital and I couldn't go to see him because I was stiff all over. It was three days before I attempted it and then I had to stand all the way in the subway, though there were lots of vacant seats. One day in a crowded car a lady offered me her seat, remarking, 'I know you must be ill, your face looks so funny.'

"I declined the seat and she asked if I was going far. 'Only to 200th street,' I told her; and we were only at Brooklyn Bridge then.

"All the time I was home I kept getting notices from the studio to come back, that there was other work for me, but I didn't go because I hated to tell what was the matter with me. But when I did go back, Fred Thompson asked, 'What kept you away?' So I told. Shortly after that I was put in the stock company and this is the only company I've ever been with."

I remembered the death of Kate Price's husband more than a year ago—a year last February, Kate said—and recalled a day at the studio last summer when Kate was going out to the cemetery to put a huge bunch of wild flowers on his grave.

"Often I get so blue," confided the big-hearted woman whom the public credits with possessing a perpetual laugh. "But I put on my hat and go out to a picture show where somebody on the screen hands me a laugh, and when I come back I'm all right. So long as I can laugh, I'm satisfied; and there are so many things in the taking of pictures that make one laugh.

"In 'Fisherman Kate,' we went down to the docks for some of the scenes; in one of them a man was to force me to leave the docks and I kept resisting and saying, 'I won't go! I won't go!' One of the men who worked around the docks watched us a few minutes and then came over with a big iron hook in his hand and, stepping in front of me, said to the rest of the company, 'Leave the woman alone; she won't go if she don't want to!" I thanked him for his protection and explained I was perfectly safe and we were only taking a picture; so he went off without a word.

"I have fun playing the funny parts, but when a role is sad I'm just as sad as it is, and generally come out of the scene crying.

"I laugh easily and I cry easily; everything goes to my heart!" Kate Price analyzed with another of her laughs.

It was not necessary for her to add, "But I laugh the easier," for those who have known the genial Kate with her dark hair drawn plainly into a knot and with the eyes and teeth and laugh and manner of one who looks for the funny things in life and always finds them, already know that to laugh is quite the most natural thing in the world, to her.

She is a comedienne to whom many owe their cures of grouch and gloom. She laughs and makes laughs.

And she is a particular favorite of thousands.

Novel Plot in Gaumont Release

The evil influence of a superstitious power forms the theme of Gaumont's three part drama "The Curse of the Scarabee Ruby," released August 1. The strong, emotional story woven from this rather slender thread is of a ruby cursed by a patriarch of long ago and which hundreds of years later casts a spell over a girl to whom it is presented by an ardent lover.

As every incident, influence, and complication in the story radiates from and revolves upon the ruby's supernatural powers of infusing an evil spirit into its wearer with the coming of darkness this must be accepted as possible at the beginning of the story, otherwise there would be no connection whatever between the events.

There is plenty of action and excitement in the picture and coupled with its mysterious atmosphere and unusual plot it will appeal to many. The photography is of high quality, and the settings and scenes expensive and well-handled. One unusually large scene is that of the dance hall showing a large section of the crowded floor and a part of the balcony. A talented cast is used in the production.

The story, briefly, is of the trials of a young girl whose lover has presented her with a large ruby which he purchased in an antique shop. Years before a curse had been put on the stone and thereafter everybody that possesses it falls under its evil spell during the hours of darkness. Mona's fiance becomes suspicious that she is leading a double life, his suspicions being aroused by seeing a girl in one of the city's cheap dance halls who looked exactly like her. He decides to declare his belief to Mona when they next

Peter and his father decide to watch Mona, and that night surprise her as she is about to leave the house. After a severe struggle they force her back into her room. Peter's father discovers the inscription on the necklet, removes it and Mona returns to her natural self. As Mona was not conscious of her actions while under the ruby's evil influence Peter and her father keep the affair a secret and destroy the ruby telling Mona that they accidentally lost it.

Ramo Play Shows Depicts War

The Ramo Films Incorporated will receive a complete series of films dealing with the present European war next Sunday morning when the ship New York arrives in port. The pictures were taken by a representative of the company at Nancy near the Alsatian frontier of France during the German invasion last week and a play was written especially to fit the present situation by Paul M. Potter entitled "The War of Wars."

It is believed that these will be the first authentic pictures of the great disturbance to reach this country and in order that they may be speedily made ready for exhibition Frank Egan has arranged to have a Sandy Hook pilot meet the steamer in New York harbor and rush the films to the Ramo laboratory where a large force will be put to work on them at once. It is expected that they will be ready for delivery by Monday.

Al. Lichtman, president of the Alco Film Company, has signed a contract with William Sievers, secretary and general manager of the New Grand Central Theater Company of St. Louis, whereby the latter company will handle the Alco program exclusively in the states of Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska and southern Illinois.

Edwin August and Mary Pickford are a combination hard to beat. At one time they acted opposite each other at the Biograph and an opportunity is being given to photoplay fans to see them in the plays which were produced by David Griffith and which are now being shown once more.

Modern and Ancient Edison Films

Variety of Offerings

THERE are two distinct victories in "Treasure Trove." One is the discovery of the hidden treasure, and the far greater one, at least in the eyes of the hunters, is the finding that the stubborn father no more opposes the affection between the two young vacationists and his daughters.

The picture is by Edison and will be released August 29. It was directed by Ashley Miller. The acting is good and the characters, scenes and photography are pleasing.

One of the main events of the story, that of finding a box of gold among the ruins of an old ship, is hardly a probability in these modern times but, as it does not come at the opportune time to save an old homestead or foil a mortgage-holding landlord, it is easily overlooked in the wholesome attraction of the rest of the picture.

Two fellow employes, Bob and Frank, receive their vacations at the same time and go camping together. On the seashore, one day, they meet Colonel Fairfield's daughters, Cora and Juanita, and finally manage to make their acquaintance. When the colonel learns that the chance acquaintance has grown into something stronger he meets the boys and tells them that the great difference in the social stations of his daughters and the two clerks prevents him approving of their love. The boys return to camp down-hearted.

Some time later the boys find a queer looking box on shore, apparently washed up by the waves of the heavy storm the night before. Inside they find a chart marked in Spanish writing. They meet the girls and one of them interprets the writing which states that at a certain point, not far distant, there is a box of gold hidden in the ruins of an old shipwreck.

The whole party start the search, find the treasure, and are returning home with it when they are discovered by a party of Spaniards who also are in search of the gold. A hot motor boat chase follows.

Returning from a hunting trip Colonel Fairfield sees the race and hurries to the rescue. He arrives just as one Spaniard has already boarded the party's boat but on seeing the enraged colonel the foreigner jumps into the water and swims away, his own boat having left him. As a reward for their chivalrous defense of his daughters the boys' courtship is no longer frowned upon.

A PLOT laid in the eighth century which has Mary Fuller and Charles Ogle in the leading roles is a decided novelty aside from the attractiveness of its unusual story and Norse characters.

Most of the settings, both interior and exterior, had to be built especially for this picture to accord with the style of dwellings used at the time the Norsemen ruled the waters.

"The Viking Queen" is its title and the release date is set for September 4. Throughout the two reels the photography is clear and distinct. The natural exteriors fit the story particularly well. Walter Edwin directed the picture, and the acting need hardly be commented on with such an able combination as scenes there were as many as two or three hundred extra people used.

melodramatic touch, careful presentation and originality.

In brief, the story is of Ragnarr's unscrupulous efforts to usurp Queen Helga's throne. His tyrannical treatment in stealing the only daughter of one of his subjects occasions a sharp reprimand from the queen and the verdict that should he be seen in the community again it would mean his death.

In revenge he bribes his followers to help him steal the queen, maroon her on an island, and then automatically the throne would go to him. They succeed and Ragnarr becomes ruler, but under his incompetent management his subjects soon become dissatisfied and threaten revolution. To cap the climax one of Ragnarr's guardsmen tells of the real fate of the queen. The false monarch is seized and executed and a party starts off to rescue the queen. They find her fatigued and ill and at first fear that she will not survive the long period of exposure and starvation, but when it is known throughout the settlement that the loved queen is on the road to recovery the factions celebrate the peace and joy which is now theirs.

THE Edison release of August 31 is, without doubt, the funniest Wood B. Wedd comedy which has yet been made. The title is "The Buxom Country Lass," and it inspires good feeling and laughter from the first appearance of the ambitious suitor, Wedd, and his friendy, Darby Jenks, until the last hope for Wedd's marriage has been shattered.

The action is slapstick in a pure form. In one scene Wood B. flies out of a barn door propelled by an invisible something and lands on his chin some six or eight feet away. When he finally stands up we all know the secret—there is a clearly outlined hoof-print on his hip pocket.

Wood B. Wedd meets Fanny Merritt and, as he is wont to do, falls in love with her. To qualify as her husband he is told that he must be able to do a full day's work on her farm. This is an impossibility for him but he enlists his friend Darby Jenks to help him.

Wedd reports for work late one afternoon, is asked to supper, and immediately afterward sent to bed. He realizes the significance of this when he is called at three o'clock the next morning and put to work.

With the aid of his friend Jenks he manages to get all the morning chores done in record time. As he is eating his breakfast Jenks appears outside the window and demands something to eat. He gets impatient at Wedd's promise to bring him something later and climbs into the window to help himself. While he is there Fanny Merritt walks into the kitchen, sees how she is being fooled, and promptly puts both Jenks and Wedd out of the house.

Octavius Again Solves Mystery

Octavius, the infallible detective, is seen at the height of his glory in "The Adventure of the Pickpocket" until he discovers that his own watch and wallet are among the things found on the fair pickpocket at the time of her arrest.

The picture, a single reel one, was taken at Coney Island, and has all the atmosphere necessary in the way of crowds, etc. It was directed by Charles M. Seay and will be released August 17.

Barry O'Moore, as Octavius, reads of the wonderful prosperity of the pickpockets at Coney Island and determines to put a stop to it at once.

He effects a disguise that couldn't fool a cigar store Indian and at once becomes a conspicuous figure at the amusement park; a large wallet leans temptingly out of his hip pocket, and a loose watch chain hangs from his coat pocket.

His first stunt is butting into a scene a film company is staging on the walk. One of the actors grabs a purse from another's hand and gets Octavius excited. He starts in pursuit and, after a long chase, overtakes the "thief." By this time a large crowd has gathered and Octavius is arrested for disorderly conduct.

By payment of a generous sum of money he is released. He meets a charming girl and invites her to luncheon. As they finish eating, two detectives arrest "Chicago Nell," Octavius' new found friend. At the station he tells the desk sergeant how he brought about the arrest, and as he finishes is struck by the familiar appearance of a wallet and watch which is among the girl's collection. Too conceited to know embarrassment, Octavius claims the articles and walks out.

The Play Is the Thing

Motion Picture Uses

THE play is the thing!"

And it is "the thing" because it holds the mirror up to life and shows us the trials and joys of human beings, and humans are vastly more interesting to us than inanimate things.

And, when it is solely a matter of an inanimate thing, it is the relationship of that inanimate thing to humans that interests us most—its service-capacity to humans. A locomotive is interesting to us, not because it is a magnificently wrought mass of iron and steel, but rather for its bearing the important relationship it does to humans, for its capacity to rapidly transport the latter and their belongings over long distances.

And so, for exactly the same reasons that the play is interesting, the human-interest element in advertising has its strong appeal. This advertising appeal is capable of reaching its ultimate goal in first-personal, oral salesmanship. It is always strong when used in on-paper salesmanship, in the advertising columns of the publications. It is well-nigh irresistible in the moving picture shows, which teem with this human interest element, and no less in commercial moving pictures.

Commercial moving pictures divide themselves very naturally into two classes. There is the film intended for private exhibition purposes. There is the film intended for general public exhibition purposes. Both are accomplishing great things, but are still in their infancy and are destined to bring about wonders still undreamed of.

A MEANS OF SHOWING BIG THINGS.

Heretofore the salesman selling buttons or any other similar small article of merchandise has had a decided advantage over his brother selling big, complicated machinery. The former could pack samples of every kind of button he offered into his sample case. But the salesman of those days attempting to arouse initial interest on the part of a prospective purchaser of a big steam shovel, concrete mixer, electric crane or other like gigantic machine, which obviously could not be taken along with him on his business trip, was very seriously handicapped. Photographs of such machinery were used to advantage. In fact, they were about the only thing available besides word-pictures and testimonials. To such salesmen the commercial motion pictures are today proving a splendid sales-producer.

Nowadays, when such a salesman seeks to interest his prospect in such herculean machinery, he can simply ask the latter's permission to pull down the shades in his office, when he calls, screw a plug into the electric fixture, focus a small picture-projecting machine, which can be carried along with him complete in a small case, on a convenient blank wall, and turn a crank. Behold, he can not only show that prospect exactly how this machinery looks, but he can show it from every side and viewpoint, show it as a whole and in every detail, while it is in motion and actually doing what is claimed for it!

To talk about the number of cubic yards of dirt a certain big steam shovel can remove in a given number of minutes is not nearly as inspiring or sales-persuading as to show that same shovel actually performing the work.

And, just as the story of one piece of machinery may be shown by means of the moving pictures in this private fashion, so can the story of a whole industry.

IN THE STEEL INDUSTRY.

Not long ago, for example, when a vice-president of the steel corporation set out for South America, to interest capitalists there in a new steel venture, he took along with him a small box which was the most carefully handled and guarded of all the baggage which went with him. That box contained a small picture-projecting machine and a roll of film. An operator accompanied it who knew every little knack about running such a machine under every kind of condition.

That South American trip was a great success, and the precious box played the stellar role in that success. It told its important commercial story of the development of the steel industry in the United States in a way that any one could understand. It told it in a universal language, which could be perfectly understand wherever that steel magnate went.

An unusual use for the commercial motion pictures was once made by the American Tobacco Company, which is a loyal advocate of the films in many ways. This company was very desirous of starting a tobacco-working factory in the Carolinas. While the building for this new industry was being erected the company found, to its dismay, that there was a strong antipathy to factory work on the part of the workers.

Factories are uncommon in the Carolinas, and the workers thereabouts had heard dire stories about the unhealthfulness and general unpleasantness of factory work, so they were quite prepared to give the new venture a cold shoulder, which promised a very serious situation for the tobacco company.

FACTORY EDUCATION.

But the trouble was neatly averted. A roll of film was exposed in certain of the company's factories in the north, showing various phases of the work and the evident content of the workers therein. This film was taken to the place where the new factory was being erected in the Carolinas and free exhibits were made of it in a small hall hired for the purpose.

It was an entertainment and the workers thereabouts flocked to be entertained. But they went away persuaded. And when the new factory opened, the films had brought about a complete reversal of local opinion on the factory question. Instead of the dreaded dearth of workers, by far more workers applied for jobs than were required and the new institution started off with flying colors, a success from the very start.

Such moving pictures as those already referred to, which are used for private showings and limited purposes, are known as "short lengths." Relatively they are inexpensive. Although they are carefully prepared, it is necessarily without the infinite plans which go into the making of the regulation lengths for general public showings.

These latter divide themselves into two general classifications. There are the commercial films which the advertising manufacturer exhibits himself, hiring his own auditoriums and sending along a corps of men with it, usually including a lecturer. And there are also the very few commercial films which are prepared with such care that they finally get on the regular moving picture circuits, being exhibited, as far as the public is concerned, not as commercial pictures but as pictures of general interest to the public because of their educational, entertaining or news value.

THE EXPENSIVE WAY.

The former way of exhibiting is by far the more expensive, per consumer reached. It is the type of film, for instance, which has been used by the Pacific Coast Borax Company, advertising 20 Mule Team Borax. This company has exhibited its borax film broadly as its own producer.

But this type of moving picture has its limitations and it is probable that it will never prove a big factor. It has two serious faults.

In the first place, because the advertiser is his own exhibitor he is of course his own censor of what shall go into his film and the tendency is to make his film so very commercial that it largely defeats its own ends. It is all business-like and not at all entertaining. It is like the theatrical write-up of a novice who would say: "Anna Held is now playing at the Lyric Theater to crowded houses," etc., etc., as compared with the story of the clever, professional theatrical press agent that "Anna Held is taking milk baths." The former method would be commercial; the latter commercial in ultimate effect but sugar coated with human interest.

The other great objection to the privately exhibited commercial film has already been referred to; the matter of expense. There are a hundred unforeseen expenses. Not only is there the expense of hall rentals, salaries for expensive operators, lecturer, helpers, etc., expensive machinery, transportation and hotel expenses, but the motion-picture film must be taken care of or it deteriorates. It must be washed in specially prepared quarters, dried in a room where the dust is filtered out of the air. It must be patched and repaired from time to time. And finally, a complete new film must be made from the the original negative every so often. Most of these are items which the private exhibitor does not foresee; they are items which are provided for in advance at minimum expense in the case of the film which goes the regular circuits.

There are two kinds of advertising in the moving pictures which go the circuits. Both must be subtle or the public will not "stand for" them.

When you go to vaudeville and one actor says to another, "Have a Tom Moore," handing him a cigar, the actor is perhaps paid a good price to say those four words. When you go to the moving-picture show and witness a film showing a big train wreck of the week previous, you are not usually disposed to wonder when you find a freight car with a big sign tacked to its side reading: "This car contains So-and-So's Chewing Gum." You take it as a matter of course, simply making a mental note: "A whole car load of that chewing gum—how wonderfully that stuff is selling."

But, in cases of this kind, a big price is sometimes paid for such a showing. It means that before the film has been taken the operator or his helper has hurriedly tacked up the painted cloth sign in question on that freight car. Naturally this sort of thing cannot be overdone with the same advertiser in too many pictures of succeeding wrecks, else the public would "get wise" and the goose that laid the golden eggs would be killed.

It was not by accident that in a film showing the exit of Col. Roosevelt from the Chicago Coliseum, after making his address before the Progressive Party convention, that a small boy pushed his way into the foreground, bearing a sign to the effect that: "So-and-So's Tobacco is Best," and was forcibly ejected, after considerable of a struggle, by a uniformed blue-coat, the sign being thrown to the ground in the most prominent position possible just before the great political leader appeared on the scene. That was not a "happen." It was planned, staged, paid for.

Nor was it a "happen" that when Governor Wilson's picture was taken, showing him talking to an open-air crowd, a big sign, advertising something or other should have emblazoned the whole side of a house directly back of the governor as he spoke. That, too, was staged with the governor playing an innocent, unknowing part in the plot. That "happen" was paid for in terms of many sound little "iron men."

But, of course, this type of moving-picture advertising has its limitations. Nor is it the kind with which the advertiser is most interested. It will do very well to advertise tobacco and chewing gum and such, but not the great majority of advertised products.

Of the commercial moving pictures which have actually gone on circuit in the moving-picture theaters of the country from coast to coast there have been very few. There have been several very good reasons for this, some of which have already been referred to. One of the chief of these is the matter of expense.

The price advances in proportion to the difficulties in getting a perfect and satisfactory film. If the film is exposed out-of-doors it is a relatively inexpensive matter. But, if it must be exposed indoors, as in a factory, a special type of artificial light must be used—sometimes dozens of them—which is very expensive and very fragile.

Then, too, more film must usually be exposed than is actually used. To get a perfect thousand feet of film it is sometimes necessary to expose several thousand feet. Often the whole operation has to be repeated several times.

And after the whole thing is completed, there is the possibility that it will be rejected by the magnates of the motion-picture circuits at a private showing given them. As a matter of fact, the number of such films which have been accepted and have gone on the circuits has not been twenty to date.

The motion-picture men do not want a large number of commercial films on their circuits anyway, for fear of overdoing the thing. And they do not at all want any film which is commercial to the exclusion of educational and story features.

One very successful film has been shown on the circuits for the Remington Typewriter Company. An interesting thing about it is the fact that it is not named "The Story of the Remington," but rather "The Story of the Typewriter." In fact, about the only place in the whole film where the word "Remington" appears is where it shows on the typewriter itself. Other than that the appearance of Miss Remington, an advertising character which has long been prominent in the Remington advertising in the magazines and newspapers, is about the only positive means of identification.

The film runs in story form, for the most part, following the history of human effort to produce a mechanical writing machine from the earliest chapter to date.

Some will probably wonder why the Remington Typewriter Company should find this film profitable. The answer is simple. The stenographers, the young women who run the typewriters in the thousands of offices, are constant patrons of the theaters. And really it is their preference as to what typewriter shall be bought

CLARA WILLIAMS is 22 years old and doesn't care who knows it. She is a Spanish type of girl with large, dark eyes, dark hair, and a most charming personality. Before her appearance as leading lady in Kay-Bee, Broncho, and Domino pictures Miss Williams' experience, both as a legitimate and screen artiste, was large and varied. She first played in stock companies in the East, then was engaged by the Essanay Company. Her next venture was as head of her own company in vaudeville after which she appeared for a year in Lubin releases. She has now been with the New York Motion Picture Corporation for eight months and has become well known because of her clever impersonations. In one picture called "Judgment" she played the leading role, which called in the beginning for a young girl and in the last scenes for the characterization of an old lady.

Clara Williams.

"BARNEY" SHERRY, as the leading man in Kay-Bee and Broncho films is known among his intimate friends, is a recruit from the legitimate stage. Not a young one in years of experience, for Mr. Sherry has toured this country from coast to coast with various companies and has been seen in important character and leading parts in many Broadway successes, besides having appeared in the principal houses of Europe. A handsome, well- built man, he makes a striking figure in pictures which, combined with his artistic ability make him an actor from whom excellent work can be expected whether the character be that of a polished gentleman or disreputable-looking tramp. He has a striking personality and his versatility in portrayal seems unlimited. Most of Mr. Sherry's leisure time is spent in his spacious library.

"Barney" Sherry.

RHEA MITCHELL has been called the "stunt girl" of the New York Motion Picture Corporation's studio because of the roles she has taken which required her jumping off cliffs, being rescued from burning ships, getting lost in swamps and quick sands and several times drowning — in pictures. Her birthplace is Portland, Oregon. Immediately after finishing school she entered theatricals via the Baker Stock Company and has played in every city on the Pacific Coast with the exception of Los Angeles. As leading lady opposite Sydney Ayres she played a whole season in a dramatic sketch over the Orpheum Theater Circuit. While playing engenue leads at the Alcanzar Theater in San Francisco Miss Mitchell became interested in motion pictures and soon joined the Kay-Bee, Broncho, and Domino forces.

Rhea Mitchell.

CHARLES E. RAY was born in Jacksonville, Ill., but it was in Peoria, Ill., that his inborn stage ambition clamored for recognition. His parents insisted on him learning a trade or entering a profession, but the only profession that appealed in any way to Charles E. was that of the footlights. His entrance into theatricals was not a bit startling. He reached the exalted position of usher after passing through the stages of hand-bill boy and water boy. His next promotion was to the box-office, and from there to extras. It was while playing in repertoire in San Diego that he made application to Thomas H. Ince for a position. Mr. Ince looked him over, accepted him, and he is now in his second year as juvenile lead in Kay-Bee, Broncho, and Domino pictures. Mr. Ray is a good athlete, excellent horseman, and enjoys driving his own car.

usually asked what machine they prefer and, if Remington has been dinned into their heads, it is naturally their preference.

THE WATERMAN PEN FILM.

As successful as any moving-picture film has been "The Story of the Fountain Pen," a feature of the advertising of the Waterman people. The thing which keeps this film from being too commercial and gives it compelling interest is its last chapter: "The Magic Fountain Pen." In this a biscuit of rubber and a small piece of gold behave in a most marvelous manner, apparently without human help.

The rubber rolls itself to a small turning-lathe and affixes itself. The lathe whirls and forms the rubber into a fountain pen barrel. The barrel throws itself off the lathe when finished. Then the gold begins in like fashion and forms itself into a pen point. Finally, the different parts, which have seemingly made themselves, fit themselves together and the selfmade magic pen goes through the most remarkable antics, making drawings which come to life, etc.

This part of the film never fails to evoke wonderment and hilarious pleasure on the part of the audience. It lasts about a minute. It required about eight hours of tedious, continuous work to make it in a moving picture studio. When the rubber biscuit moved toward the lathe, for instance, one picture was taken, then a man had to move the biscuit a sixteenth of an inch. Then another picture was taken. Then it was moved another sixteenth of an inch. Then another picture was taken. And so on for nerve-racking hours.

This Waterman film has been very successful from a sales stndpoint. Requests for second and third showings come in with such regularity from dealers in localities where it is projected on the screen that the Waterman people really have little need for any other information as to its whereabouts.

THE ANHEUSER FILM.

Of the most successful commercial films on the circuits a third is that of the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Company, St. Louis. This film tells the story of the making of beer in such a way that it is highly educational. A whole story could be written about the pains which were expended in the artificial reproduction of the scenes attendant upon the gathering of the hops and various grains used in the making of that beer.

The story is complete, even including the allied Anheuser departments, such as the bottle-making department, where thousands of bottles are made a day; the department where bar fixtures are manufactured and even the department where the bodies for Anheuser wagons and auto trucks are made.

The advertising value of the few commercial films which have got on the circuits is great. The clientele of the moving-picture houses is enormous, running 'way up in the millions. Not one film but several films made from the same original negative are kept on the road. They are even sent abroad, to Australia and to Europe. A moving-picture theater receives among its quota of films one commercial film every so many weeks; never oftener. And in this way the commercial film is far from a bore but rather an anticipated treat, of great interest and educational value to the audiences.

As has been said, the possibilities of this sort of advertising are limitless. The field is still in its infancy. The number of films which have been shown to date is but as a drop in the bucket to what might be and will be shown when once the possibilities are really known and appreciated by the advertisers with nation-wide and world-wide distributions.

The Long Film

For all our reputed stolidity and phlegm, we are, in some matters, an impulsive race. Having jumped with full-blooded enthusiasm to one extreme, we are as ready as any mercurial southerner to leap back to the other. The tendency is particularly to be observed in our attitude towards a novelty. Until we have had time to make up our minds about a thing, we blow hot and cold as readily as our English spring—and then, having been taught by our experiences to understand the full nature of the point at issue, we finally settle down to a state of comfortable and permanent tolerance.

For a considerable time the question of the long film has been a problem responsible for much perturbation amongst the members of the British cinematograph industry. At its first coming we were all —or most of us—enthusiastically in favor of it; now, by the usual swing of the pendulum, a large proportion of us seems to be against it. The truth is that we have scarcely had time to adopt towards it any final and settled attitude at all.

The matter has so often been dealt with in these columns and is so patent to the unbiased thinker, that there is no necessity for us to point out the long film's obvious right to existence from an artistic point of view. Nearly all the greatest masterpieces that have hitherto been vouchsafed to us through the medium of the cinematograph have been "long films," and to exclude this particular type of picture would mean hopelessly maiming the wonderful new art by whose birth we are all profiting. The long film is good; and, in the end, the public (especially the most intelligent and best paying section of it) wants what is good.

We do not, of course, suggest that the long film will oust the short film. That would be as foolish as saying that the short film will annihilate the long film. When the industry has had still further time to settle down to anything approaching a final state the two classes of pictures—and of entertainment—will flourish happily side by side, and the expansion which this implies will be of benefit rather than of harm.

Meanwhile, it is regrettable that the present condition of reaction against the long film should be responsible for the practical boycotting of certain magnificent pictures whose only flaw is their excessive length—excessive, be it noted, for alleged utilitarian, and not for artistic reasons. It would, indeed, be pitiful to think that no room could be found, in an industry which has always shown itself ready to welcome noble things, for some of the recently-produced masterpieces which are apparently hanging fire on the market on account of their length, or that no encouragement could be offered to workers who, by developing the art of the cinematograph towards its highest possibilities, are assisting us all to secure for it the performance and dignity it deserves.—The Bioscope.

The Man Who Launched "Cabiria"

Harry Rush Raver

PIONEERS, the men who blaze the trail, always command the respect of those who follow them. Especially is this true when they not only head the procession in the early days but when they continue to hold a commanding position in a growing industry.

This naturally brings us to Harry Rush Raver, a pioneer film man, who today holds a commanding place in the motion picture industry, for it was Mr. Raver who brought "Cabiria," a film which is doing more than any other to raise the plane of the motion picture into this country, and it was also he who founded the All Star Feature Corporation of which he is president and active head. Either of these achievements is enough to place a man high in the hall of the motion picture fame.

Harry Rush Raver.

For Mr. Raver, who is still Harry to his friends despite his prominent position in the motion picture industry, is a real pioneer. He can well remember the days when subjects came in fifty foot lengths and such a thing as a connected story told on the screen was undreamed of.

Fifteen years of practical experience is back of Mr. Raver for he first got into the motion picture business way back in 1899. At that time he was associated with Bostock's Zoo at the Philadelphia exposition and, seeing the wonderful field open to motion pictures as as amusement enterprise he bought a projection machine and some films.

The subjects wouldn't be much to brag about in these days. They were each fifty feet long and were all of the simplest order, a single scene photographed and projected. But, at that time, they were the best to be obtained.

Mr. Raver took these films and song slides on a tour through the West on which he played all the smaller cities and the towns.. At that time the motion picture were traveling shows and played in the Opera Houses and local theaters of the places they visited for theaters permanently devoted to motion pictures were practically unknown. Later Mr. Raver secured "McKinley's Funeral" and other subjects but they were all short films, either topical in nature or consisting of a single scene.

When "The Great Train Robbery" was produced in 1904, Raver and Darnaby operated this picture and "The Alps," an electrical show under canvas. "The Great Train Robbery," alone, under Mr. Raver's direction took in more than $30,000 in twenty-eight weeks that year. This is more than $1,000 a week for a thousand feet of film on tour so it may easily be seen that there were showmen in those days.

Soon Mr. Raver concentrated all his time upon the motion picture business. He managed theaters for William H. Swanson in Chicago and also conducted Swanson's exchange in Omaha. Later he managed other offices, one in Washington, D. C., and one in Baltimore. At this time the motion picture business was in a formative stage and changes were frequent and important.

When the Eclair Company of France needed some one to take charge of its affairs in this country Mr. Raver was selected for the position of general manager. When the Motion Picture Sales and Distributing Company was formed the hustling Raver was one of the directors and took a prominent part in the affairs of that organization. Previous to that he was secretary and treasurer of the Association of Independent Film Manufacturers. Mr. Raver was one of the group that formed the Film Supply Company of America of which he was secretary and general manager. Besides the offices he holds which are mentioned earlier in the article Mr. Raver is secretary and treasurer of the Itala Film Company of America and of the Exclusive Supply Corporation.

One feat of Mr. Raver's which is worthy of special mention is his bringing Cabiria into this country. More than any other, this production is, at the present time, placing the motion picture higher and higher in the opinion of the general public.

Cabiria is a twelve reel picture universally felt to be the most wonderful photo-dramatic spectacle ever produced and is being used as a standard of comparison for all exceptionally meritorious pictures.

Just a word about the personal characteristics of this man who worked himself up to a secure position among the film autocrats. He is more than six feet tall, spare of frame and it has been said of him that "he can look wistful." He has a way of gazing into space and then slowly but surely delivering a crushing ultimatum that is very disconcerting.

He could point with pride, if he ever pointed to any of his achievements to the success of the All Star Feature Corporation and the triumph of the American tour of Cabiria as being due to him. Incidentally his mind is always focussed on the future, always looking ahead and what he has already accomplished may be regarded as only the foundation of the structure of his life work.

Outside of office hours Mr. Raver bids far to become a gentleman farmer. He recently purchased a country home in Bound Brook, N. J., and turned it over to his parents, though he frequently motors over to visit the place, which is within an hour's ride of New York City. In addition he has purchased a parcel of land in Palisade, N. J. and will soon build on it.

In his business career Mr. Raver has always been aggressive. When the Motion Picture Patents Company was formed he was among the "independents" and in all their struggles he took a prominent part. He has always been ready to fight for the right and has always done so. As a result his business associates today accord him every confidence.

The Fireproof Projection Room

For several years practically all cities have had ordinances enforcing the use of fireproof booths for the operator. The idea, of course, is to confine any possible fire, which may originate in the film, to the operating room. This procedure, while not particularly conducive to the safety of the operator himself, protects the audience from the possible results of carelessness on his part.

The fireproof projecting room is an excellent feature when its properties are explained to the public, so that everyone who attends the picture theater knows that no danger can possibly arise in that direction. Without this publication of the fireproof qualities of the booth, its value is greatly reduced; for it is panic, more than fire itself, that is to be dreaded.

Panic in a crowded place is a terrible thing. At the flash of a little flame, a puff of smoke, people have trampled out the lives of their fellow-beings in a mad, unreasoning rush for the outside. The booth might be of solid metal and asbestos, with trap shutters for all its openings; the whole building of the theater might be absolutely fireproof; but that would not prevent the public, transformed by the animal flash of fear into an unreasoning mob, from fighting its way out over the bodies of its weaklings and women and children.

So, obviously, the thing to do is to have a fireproof booth and to let the public know it. The first slide in every show should explain to the public the absolute safety of the auditorium, what ever might happen in the operating room.

Following precautions taken by the authorities of such states as Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Maine, Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island and others, who have enacted laws compelling the use of a fireproof booth or enclosure to eliminate the possibility of fire in case the inflammable celluloid film used in moving picture machines catches fire, the State of New York has amended Chapter 756, effective July 24, 1911, to read:

No cinematograph or any other apparatus for projecting moving pictures, which apparatus uses combustible films of more than ten inches in length, shall be set up for use or used in any building place of public assemblage or entertainment, unless such apparatus for the projecting of moving pictures shall be enclosed therein in a booth or inclosure constructed of iron framework covered or lined with asbestos board, or with some equally strong and fire-resisting material, and unless such booth shall have been constructed as provided in Section 210 of this article and the certificate in Section 211 of this article shall have been issued to the owner or lessee of the premises wherein such booth is situated.

One such booth which meets the need of this protection for moving picture machines and films and conforms to the requirements of the insurance authorities and inspection departments of the states which passed such laws, and which has been tested and approved by the New York City building department is known in the trade as transite asbestos wood booths.

The framework of these booths is of heavy angle irons or tees on which the asbestos wood panels are mounted, and when set up, the booth can be painted and decorated in keeping with any style of interior finish.

These booths are made in two styles, stationary and semi-portable. The permanent or stationary booth is shipped "knocked down" and is provided with a door and window shutters which close automatically in case of fire. Also, when desired, a complete ventilating system can be furnished for this booth, including galvanized iron pipe flues and an exhaust fan. In the semi-portable booths, the asbestos wood panels forming the walls and roof are interchangeable, and are marked so that the booth can easily be set up in an hour's time by any carpenter.

There is also a portable tent booth, which consists of an asbestos cloth covering in three pieces, forming the top, sides and flooring, over an iron pipe framework. The cloth, which resembles heavy cotton duck, is made wholly of asbestos, and is furnished plain or painted, or sized and tinted like asbestos fire curtains. A hinged trap affording ventilating space is furnished with this booth, which closes automatically in case of fire. This booth is easily taken down and set up in a few minutes, as the frame is made with socket fittings and the asbestos cloth can be folded into a compact bundle. When packed for shipment, this booth weighs less than 160 pounds.

Something of this sort should be installed by every theater manager whether his local ordinances require it or not. There is nothing like being prepared for emergencies. And don't forget to let the people know that no harm can come to them.

The Kinematograph in Research

In an extremely interesting lecture before the Fränkisch-Oberpfälzischer Section of the Verein deutscher Ingenieure, Dr.-Ing. Hanz Goetz outlined the part kinematography had played in scientific and technical research and suggested some of the things that may be expected of it in the future. After an introduction giving statistics, describing apparatus, and outlining the history of the invention, the lecture takes up the position of moving-picture photography among the means of reproducing phenomena to the census. It differs from other means, in that it correlates two of the basic quantities that physics deals with, time and extension in space.

The most obvious way in which the kinematograph may act as an aid to science is in recording rare phenomena, such as scenes in the life of seldom seen or difficultly accessible animals, unusual surgical operations, etc.—fields in which considerable success has been attained. Its usefulness only begins here, however. Just as the scale of objects may be varied when they are represented graphically, so the time scale of actions may be changed when they are represented by the kinematograph. By an increase in speed, Prof. Pfeffer, of Leipzig, has been able to reproduce in three minutes a ten-day growth of a horse-chestnut twig; pictures for this reproduction were taken at five-minute intervals. A large field for the study of the growth of both plants and animals is thus opened up. Just as slow motions can be hastened so that it is possible to see the total effect in a truer perspective, so it is possible to retard and analyze quick movements, and the limits are only those of the speed with which the pictures can be taken. With the most refined mechanical devices it is not possible to take more than 250 pictures per second, but by illuminating the moving object with regularly succeeding electric sparks and photographing on a film moving continuously rather than intermittently, it was found possible to increase the number of exposures to 2,000 per second. Bull, for example, has made valuable studies of the flight of insects in this manner.

From an engineering point of view the kinematograph has been most useful in studying projectiles and their effect on armor plate. Much higher frequencies had to be used than Bull obtained, and the apparatus em- and "His Ancestors" have all shown him in the lead ployed differed from his in not using a mechanical interrupter; in series with the illuminating spark-gap was a large condenser, and in parallel with it a small one; the large condenser is charged by an induction machine, and when it is discharged the small condenser is alternately charged and discharged across the gap. The period of the alternations can be judged with fair accuracy by the tone. Since an explosion can take place in the 5/1,000th part of a second, the speed of 9,000 to 50,000 exposures per second, obtained by this method, is sufficient to furnish interesting results. Since it is obviously impossible to have the camera near the object photographed, a special arrangement is used.

The kinematograph can also be used for making quantitative measurements of movements. The fall of a body has been studied by photographing on the same film the falling object and the hand of a chronograph, and in the same way the action of a steam hammer has been timed.

In these lines the kinematograph has just begun to be developed, and offers great possibilities in solving problems dealing with time and space in fields as wide apart as engineering and biology, and makes possible the study of motions so slow that it has hitherto been impossible to form conception of their whole meaning, or so fast that it has been almost impossible to form any conception of them at all.—Journal Engineering and Industrial Chemistry.

Recent Patents in Motography

By David S. Hulfish

No. 1,059,488. For an Improved Apparatus for Producing X-Ray Kinematographic Pictures. Issued to Josef Rosenthal, Munich, Germany.

The apparatus is a plate-carrying device highly specialized for X-ray work, and the claims of the patent are written upon the process of moving the plates into position for exposure. The preliminary statement of the inventor, reciting the difficulties of X-ray photography for moving picture work, is of interest:

For the purpose of producing X-ray kinematographic pictures, plates or films of considerably greater dimensions or rather of materially greater bulk are needed than those usable for the ordinary kinematographic pictures, and hence the means employed for the production of the latter would not serve for producing the X-ray pictures. To adapt the means used in producing ordinary kinematographic pictures, i. e., perforating the film length laterally or centrally and using the ordinary Maltese cross arrangement, would not be feasible for X-ray kinematographic pictures, as, owing to the materially greater breadth and height and the greater bulk of required material, practical difficulty would be encountered in feeding the single film length forward at sufficient speed and causing its momentary stoppage at the proper time.

Owing to the difficulties attendant upon the use of a single film it is advisable in producing X-ray pictures to employ plate holders, each adapted to contain an individual plate or film.

It is the purpose of this invention to provide an apparatus by means of which X-ray kinematographic pictures may be produced by the employment of individual plates or films, each plate being subjected to the X-rays a suitable length of time without any other plate or film being prematurely affected by the rays.

1,059,969. For an Improved Lantern for Slides, etc. Issued to Messrs. E. Bausch, H. Bausch, G. Hommel, W. L. Patterson and E. Sailer, Rochester, N. Y., assignors to Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., No. 2, Rochester, N. Y. (Application filed October 3, 1906.)

This patent is for an optical lantern of general application to projection purposes, not specialized for motion pictures. It is arranged to project both transparent slides and solid bodies of various characters. An illustration of the patent is reproduced herewith, and the patent in full would prove of interest to motion picture projectionists who have an interest in projection aside from ordinary picture-house work.

Brevities of the Business

George A. Lassey, the well-known dramatic photoplay director, has signed with the Universal Company to direct Imp features with King Baggot in the leads. Mr. Lessey has been a director for the Edison Company during the past two years and has attracted wide-spread attention by his ability to handle strong dramatic stories. Mr. Lessey, though still in his early thirties, has achieved his success through long and practical experience. Starting when he was a boy playing leads in the amateur theatrical of Amherst, his home town, Mr. Lessey has faced the footlight under every condition common to the profession. His parents were not theatrical people, but his first professional part on the road as "Horatio" in "Hamlet" kindled the spark that, burning always higher, disclosed gradually the real genius. Prior to Mr. Lessey becoming a director, he was a leading man with the Edison Company for a year. He is a furious worker, though the speed characteristic of him is always balanced with care and attention to detail. During the first year that he was a director he produced fifty-thousand feet of negative, every foot of which was released and proved successful. His latest big feature was the "Cleek" detective series.

George A. Lessey.

C. Jay Williams, another Edison director is also leaving that Company to join the Universal where he will produce comedies. It will probably be during the first part of August that he will make the move, going direct to the Pacific Coast where, at the Universal's Hollywood studios, he will take up his active duties. Accompanying him will be Mrs. Williams, who has been a member of his Edison comedy company, and who will be one of the leads in the new company to be formed. Mr. Williams was born a long time ago in New York City and is of Welsh and German descent. When still a boy he decided to become an actor and an actor he remained until he joined the moving picture ranks and became a director. He says himself that he knew nothing of pictures until four years ago when a friend, a fellow actor, induced him to pose for the part of Beethoven in an Edison play, "Beethoven's Moonlight Sonota." He scored an immediate success and was engaged to appear in several other productions by the same company. Then he departed from pictures for a while to tour with Blanche Walsh in "The Test." But the seed had been sown. Mr. Williams was assured of the screen's future and so when he completed the tour, he negotiated with the Edison for a position as director. To learn if he made good one has only to recall such comedies as "Caste" "Why Girls Leave Home" and the series of "Mr. Wood B. Wedd."

W. N. Selig has been honored by a proffered membership in the California Historical Landmarks League on account of the splendid manner in which the pictures turned out by his company have exploited the early life in that state and shown its many ancient missions.

The Twentieth Century Feature Film Company have just completed their first American production, in four parts. The story is based on an occurrence which has held the front page of all the newspapers of the world for the last month. The title is to be announced later. Mr. K. M. Turner, the inventor of the dictograph appears in the film.

During the Prescott Pioneer Day Celebration, held in Arizona on July 12 and 13, Norbert A. Myles, leading man of the Eclair Western Company, was entered as mechanic in one of the automobile races but the director balked and refused his permission before the race started as Myles was playing leading parts in six different scenarios in course of production and he refused to take a chance on not being able to finish them.

The Smallwood Film Corporation of New York has closed a contract with the well known firm of Heinrich Ernemann, Dresden, Germany, whereby the former are given the exclusive right to distribute the Ernemann Kinox Projector in the New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan.

Bessie Barriscale, who is to play "Juanita" in "The Rose of The Rancho," was selected by Jesse L. Lasky from seven hundred prominent applicants. Miss Barriscale had the advantage of having played the part four hundred times.

Jeff Dolan, known as "the little half portion," is on an extended selling trip through the New England states with "The Fall of Mammon."

Chicago long distance photoplay records have been shattered by "Neptune's Daughter," which is now in its twelfth week at the Fine Arts Theater. It is expected that the picture, in which graceful Annette Kellerman is featured, will remain at the elite playhouse for about ten more weeks.

BREVITIES OF THE BUSINESS.

Clarence Badger, scenario writer for the Allen Curtis Joker comedy company of the Universal, was married at San Diego on July 16 to Miss Lillian Schoene of Hollywood, Calif. A long romance came to a climax with this event as their parents had planned that their children should wed and Mr. Badger and Miss Schoene grew up as sweethearts. After their marriage they spent a short honeymoon along the Mexican border.

Jesse Jacobs, manager of the Star Family Theater at 482 Third Ave., New York City has made a practice of running "Darwin Karr Night," at which time he features the famous Vitagraph star. He says the practice is proving a great success and urges his brother exhibitors to try something along the same lines.

Robert Leonard and his Rex (Universal) company left Los Angeles on July 25 for Pine Crest, San Bernardino county, California, one of the most densely wooded districts in the United States, to produce two dramas of the timberlands.

Starting Tuesday, September 8, the Biograph Company will release a two reel subject every week.

Guy Coombs, the well known Kalem player, has left that company to play leads in his own company which is soon to begin producing. The films will be marketed under the star's name.

Miss Eleanor Woodruff, for some time past a member of the Pathe Freres Company is also to be retained at their American studios, together with Crane Wilbur, Pearl White and Paul Panser. All the other players have been released.

Hunter Bennett, assistant general manager of the World Film Corporation has been on a trip throughout the United States for the past four weeks. Having covered the eastern territory, he is now making San Francisco his headquarters for the West.

While others have offered complaints of poor business during the hot weather, W. A. Baier and O. H. Jacobs, Milwaukee feature exchange men, have been quietly building up a big business throughout Wisconsin. The result is that the concern has now taken the name, Film Booking Office, with a generous suite of offices covering a large part of the third floor of the Manhattan Building, Milwaukee.

In a Rex drama, entitled, "For the Secret Service," little Ella Hall, one of the youngest leading women on the screen, recently wore a full evening dress for the first time in her life. She is only 17 years old and it is only recently she has been assigned roles of a full grown woman in the company of which Robert Leonard is director.

"The Avenging Conscience," a photo-drama in six reels, based on Edgar Allan Poe's story, "The Tell Tale Heart" and some of his poems, is the newest D. W. Griffith's film to be released by the Mutual Film Corporation. It had its first public performance in the east at the Strand Theater, New York City, this week.

"The Chimes," by Chas. Dickens will be produced in five acts by the World Film Corporation about the middle of September, the leading role being played by Tom Terris, the famous English actor, who is one of the greatest living impersonators of Charles Dickens characters.

D. Annuzio's "Cabiria" the masterpiece of Itala Films, Torino, will be specially presented on August 21st by Mrs. H. H. Rogers, widow of the Standard Oil magnate to a select party of her friends at her palatial country home at Southampton, L. I. For this picture for a single evening, Mrs. Rogers will pay more than $1,000.

Due to the expanding business of the World Film Corporation it has been necessary to add five more new offices to their already spacious quarters.

Edna Mayo, late of several Broadway successes, including "Help Wanted" and "Excuse Me," has been engaged by the Favorite Players Company to play opposite Carlyle Blackwell in their first production, "The Key to Yesterday," adapted from Charles Neville Buck's story.

Harry A. Samwick, president of the Exclusive Features Inc., New York, preferring to be on this side looking over, than on the other side trying to get back, has abandoned his proposed trip to Europe.

P. Plummer of the Film Supply Company is enjoying a week's vacation.

Abraham Potiker, exchange-man and exhibitor of Cleveland, who recently returned from Austria-Hungary has received word from the Austrian Consul to report to Austria for military duty.

A keen interest is being displayed at every performance at the Strand Theater when the European army and navy pictures are shown. The German Emperor reviewing his troops in sham battle, different branches of the German and French army, German Naval pictures taken at Kiel and the funeral of the Grand Duke and Duchess of Austria are shown on the screen.

Eldean Stewart, one of the "Five Stewarts," who has played with Mary Pickford since she was two months old, will again be seen with her in the Famous Players production, "Behind the Scenes."

The Universal Western "cut up," Bess Meredyth, was to have gone to San Diego, Cal., recently to run off a comedy and she and the company were delighted. It was called off, so Bess gged up a coffin, laid a skeleton therein and sent for the general manager. When Isidore Bernstein arrived he found them all around the coffin weeping and on the coffin a placard which set forth "Sacred to the Memory of a Busted Trip." Bernie enjoyed the joke.

Pearl White, better known as "Pauline," was badly shaken up last Sunday when the horse of a cab in which she was riding stumbled and fell, throwing the pretty heroine of the screen to the pavement.

J. P. McGowan of the Kalem Company is arranging for a very important series of one reel railroad stories which will feature Helen Holmes, and for which a specially selected cast of "types" will be engaged.

Myrtle Stedman appears as the daughter in "Pursuit of Phantom," made by the Bosworth, Inc., which was written by Hobart Bosworth and in which he takes the lead. Courtenal Foote made his initial appearance with the Bosworths in this picture. The story is in four reels and is a study of the lives of a rich man and a comparatively poor artist with a girl as the connecting link in the play.

Harold Lockwood of the Famous Players gives his receipt for picture acting thus: "I am always trying to make three things go at the same time. To think of what will please the public in my acting, that's commerce; to study what my director wants, that's wisdom; to be as natural as possible, that's art."

Edgar Jones is making a mark in Lubin films by merit of his splendid horsemanship, and he is declared to be a master of horses. Pictures made "at the sign of the bell" are receiving the benefit of his ability for rough riding. He learned to ride, he claims, when he was a youngster and has made horses his "hobby" and chief recreation ever since then.

Willard Holcomb, formerly of Kinemacolor, has dramatized R. D. Blackmore's novel, "Lorna Doone," into a four-act play which was initially presented at the Chestnut Street Theater in Philadelphia by the Orpheum Players. Mr. Holcomb has been very successful in his legitimate stage productions and is the original dramatizer of "St. Elmo."

L. B. Elliott of Denver has taken over the management of the popular Lyric moving picture house in Cheyenne, succeeding M. H. Todd.

No better proof of the popularity of Kleine-Cines actresses on the continent of Europe than the fact that in a recent popularity contest held by the "Film," a prominent motion picture journal on the other side of the Atlantic, six of the first thirteen feminine players were members of the Kleine-Cines organization.

As is well known films of celluloid have the disagreeable property of burning at a point a little below 100 degrees centigrade, and as they are passed near a point where the temperature is near this point or above it, due to the excessive heat of the carbon or calcium light used for projecting upon the screen, the result was that many cases of fire and dangerous panics resulted, even in the most careful handling of the films.

The German authorities took this matter up and demanded that the projecting lenses and lamps be encased in an iron case which must be equipped with double walls in such a way that there is a sufficient supply of ventilation and cooling to avoid excessive heating. Bottoms, walls and ceilings of these cases must be lined with asbestos, and the heat generated by the calcium light or whatever source of illumination is used, must be conveyed to the outside by proper ventilation systems.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believoing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, Motography has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in Motography as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

Siren's Charms Lead Her to Death

Gripping Eclectic Feature

THE ECLECTIC FILM COMPANY is now releasing what is probably its best feature since that masterpiece, "Les Miserables." The title is "The Siren," and careful, experienced cutting has left six solid reels of continued aciton, entirely free from padding.

The acting is superb, each member of the cast putting a personality into the work that gives great strength to the characterizations. Mlle. Mistin Guett plays the leading role as Fernande, the treacherous flirt. One of the principal parts, that of Dr. Williams, is taken by Henri Krauss, who will be remembered as Jean Val Jean in "Les Miserables."

There is a wonderful fascination to the story, which sets forth the alluring charms and enticing ways of a veritable siren, a young and beautiful woman, who pretends to love and encourages the attentions of every man she meets until finally the mother of one of her victims, goaded almost to insanity by the knowledge of how her son's head had been turned by the deceitful woman, attacks her and puts an end to her life of wantonly playing with men's hearts.

Beth rejects the French Duke's proposal of marriage in Eclectic's "All Love Excelling."

It is evident that the director of the production has a thorough knowledge of dramatic value, for the crises are carefully developed and approached, and are kept in doubt just long enough to make the suspense exciting without verging on impatience. The picture is undoubtedly an exceptional one and will be a strong drawing card on any exhibitor's program.

Fernande tires of her monotonous existence with her parents and wishes to get out and mix with the excitement of the world. Dr. Williams is the first victim of her coquetry, and after their marriage she continues to meet and go out with her other sweethearts. The doctor learns of her deceit and in a rage strikes her. Soon afterwards he leaves the house and on his return discovers that his wife has gone away.

The Siren charms the peasant in "The Siren."

Fernande goes to Paris where her life is one series of flirtations. She becomes a prominent figure in the cafes, and has a long string of admirers. One of these, a Count Adolphe, is so much taken with her charms that he decides to marry her and writes his grandfather of his decision. He receives a letter forbidding the marriage, but nevertheless proposes to Fernande. She is surprised, not having expected him to take the matter so seriously, and to avoid the count goes to Brittany.

The doctor again meets his wife in Eclectic's "The Siren."

Here life proves entirely too slow for her and she starts a flirtation with a young fisherman, Pierre, who becomes madly in love with her. The young fellow's mother notices a marked change in him and pleads with her son to give up the enchantress, but he pays no attention to her entreaties.

Count Adolphe follows Fernande from Paris and continues his suit at her Brittany home. Seeking to re-unite her son and his wife, for Pierre is now living with the siren, the young fisherman's mother appeals to a Dr. Williams to intercede for her. The doctor visits Fernande's home just in time to prevent Pierre's killing Count Adolphe, whom he has discovered making love to Fernande. The doctor informs the foolish lovers who the girl really is. The shock effects Pierre's reason and in his insane struggles he falls and strikes his head, inflicting a dangerous wound. The doctor begins to upbraid Fernande, but is met with those same charms which had made him her first victim. When he gives in at her show of penitence she laughs at him and calls him an old fool.

Later Fernande attempts to visit Pierre at his home, but is met by his mother upon whom her charms are useless. As she tries to force her way into the room, the mother seizes a mallet-shaped instrument and strikes her on the head, killing her. Dr. Williams takes the weapon from her hand as the neighbors rush in, as he thus assumes the responsibility of the crime, relying on the law to uphold him for destroying his faithless wife.

PAULINE manages to find excitement and danger without any assistance from her guardian, Owen, in the eleventh episode of "The Perils of Pauline," but that is not because Owen has run out of villainous schemes but rather because Pauline's impatience and vivaciousness do not allow his plans time to develop, and prompt her to take a wild automobile ride with a driver whom she has good reason to believe is something of a monomaniac. As usual she realizes her foolishness too late.

A real breath-holding thrill is furnished by an auto's wild leap over a cliff and its rolling down the face of the hill to the bottom where it soon catches fire and is reduced to ashes.

In several ways this release is distinctly better than many of the preceding episodes. The photography in itself is splendid, and has better subjects to display in the beautiful wide stretches of lawn and gardens, country road scenes, and the views of the auto's turtle-like descent down the face of the cliff. The story, even, seems a little more complicated and deeper than the usual theme of the adventures of this series.

While deeply interested in an article in one of the current magazines telling of a missing auto racer who was injured in one of the cup races, Pauline is interrupted by receiving an invitation to attend the wedding of one of her friends. A short time later Harry discovers Owen reading the note which still lies on the table. Instantly suspicious of the guardian, Harry decides to watch him. He sees Owen talking to the lion tamer who is to perform at the wedding and, fearing some new danger for his adopted sister, Harry plans to prevent her attending the ceremony.

He takes the chauffeur into his confidence, has the car taken to town for repairs and the driver telegraph an excuse for being unable to return before the next day.

In the meantime Pauline has met the new gardener and thinks she recognizes in him the missing driver whom she had been reading of in the magazine. When she receives the telegram informing her of the chauffeur's inability to return in time to take her to the wedding Pauline is greatly put out and determines to go any way. She asks the new gardener to drive her machine, but he vacantly claims he knows nothing about an auto. Still convinced that he is the missing racer, Pauline has him enter the car and directs him in starting it. They are on the road but a short time when the driver seems to be awakened by the feel of the steering wheel and whirl of the motor, and lets the car out at full speed.

Returning from the office Harry recognizes the pair in the speeding machine and follows in pursuit. Pauline's efforts to induce the maniac to slow up are useless. In desperation she attempts to seize the wheel herself and the car becomes uncontrollable, leaves the road and plunges over a cliff. Harry hurries to the bottom and finds the occupants pinned beneath the remains of the machine. On regaining consciousness Pauline's first words are to the effect that she intends to attend her friend's wedding in spite of all, but immediately afterwards she faints in Harry's arms.

"ALL LOVE EXCELLING" is a dramatic tale of a woman's noble sacrifice for the man she loves. Strongly appealing, the story pictures the trials and sorrows of a young woman who gives up her lover because his father opposes his choice, and as she has promised to keep the agreement secret, is unable to explain satisfactorily her reason for refusing his proposal where her actions plainly show that she loves him.

The picture is in three parts, strongly acted, and has a fitting background in elaborately furnished interior settings and several unusually fine exteriors of military camp life.

Eleanor Woodruff plays the lead in the role of Beth, an American girl of modest means, with whom the wealthy Lord Edward Litchfield (Jack Standing) falls in love. Crane Wilbur as Duc de St. Claire is at first an ardent suitor, later somewhat of a vicious avenger, and in the end a heart-broken old man who has truly loved but one girl and been deprived of her by fate. The remainder of the cast is composed of Margaret Risser as Valerie, the count's niece; George Leary as Lord Edward's son; Gertrude Cameron as Mildred Sperry, later Lord Edward's wife, and Edward Jose as Lord Edward's father.

At the opening of the story Beth and Lord Edward are sweethearts. One day the young lord's father calls on Beth and begs her to discourage his son's attentions, as their marriage would reflect on the family honor. To save Lord Edward his inheritance and position in court Beth agrees. He pleads in vain, but her only answer is that her love for him is dead.

It is several years before they meet again. In the meantime Edward has met Mildred Sperry, of whom his parents approve, and they become engaged. Beth reads the announcement and writes Lord Edward, asking that her letters be returned. He brings them in person, his old love awakens and he tries to persuade Beth to take him back. Loving him as much as ever, she is tempted to do so, but is prevented by her promise to his father.

Beth meets a French nobleman, Duc de St. Claire, who falls in love with her and proposes, but with the memory of Edward still fresh in her mind she refuses him. Three years later Beth attends a ball at which both Lord Edward and the duke are present, as is Mildred, who is now Lord Edward's wife. The duke again makes advances to Beth, but is denied any encouragement. Seeing Lord Edward and Beth conversing confidentially, the duke seeks revenge by telling Mildred that her husband loves another. Beth, who has been listening, assures Mildred that it is not so.

Seventeen years pass. Lord Edward's son, now a young man, is in love with the duke's niece, Valerie, whom he has adopted at his brother's death. The young girl writes to her guardian, who is serving in the Crimean war, for permission to marry young Lord Edward. Recognizing in the name the son of his old rival the duke refuses. In a desperate mood the young fellow enlists in the army, is wounded and comes under the care of Beth, who has taken the vows and is now a Sister of Mercy. Beth finds the duke's letter in the young man's pocket and is astonished to learn that she is taking care of her lover's son.

She goes to the duke's tent and pleads with him to waive his stubborn decision and allow the marriage of his niece and Lord Edward. Recognizing in the Sister of Mercy the girl of his heart's desire, he gives in to her request. In despair he seeks seclusion as he realizes his chances of gaining Beth's love are gone forever.

Popular Novel Filmed by Edison

Clever Adaptation Made

EDISON'S release of September 9 is to be a two-reel adaptation of a novel which appeared in one of the spring issues of the Popular Magazine, entitled "Face Value." It is a snappy story with lots of originality in its composition and enough of the right kind of romance and action to make it interesting to anyone.

Pictures without number have been made in which people have lost or concealed their identity and recovered or assumed it again just in time to benefit by somebody's will, but, though that is the general outline of "Face Value," the details give it a much different atmosphere. The hero in this case makes an agreement with a man to accept his identity and name, and incidentally any dangers which might follow in their wake, and to claim an estate in the East which the stranger says has been willed to him.

To his surprise he learns that the man is an impostor passing for himself, and that instead of receiving only half, as he has agreed, he is entitled to all of the benefits of his uncle's will, but in order to profit by it he must go east, assuming the responsibility of any enmity aroused by the impostor. The interest is kept at its highest point at all times by the unique complications rising out of this strange agreement.

The action opens in the West, but early in the first reel is transferred to the East, where it continues to the end. It was in the taking of the western scenes in this picture that a group of the actors were arrested in Van Courtlandt Park for carrying firearms in violation of the law.

The principal roles are taken by Ben Wilson, as Peter Hardyne Wilding, alias "Kelly"; Edward Earle, as Peter Wilding, alias "Pete Scarlett"; and Sallie Crute, as Polly Winthrop. The director was George Lessey.

Silas Wilding's nephew, Peter Hardyne Wilding, finishes college and goes west, where he is known as Kelly, and also as a man whose fighting ability is far above par. Peter Wilding, also a nephew of the rich Silas Wilding, becomes involved in numerous scrapes in the East, is disinherited by his uncle, and leaves for the West. He journeys to Silver Gulch and meets Kelly, who, for some reason unknown to himself, takes a liking to the coward known as Pete Scarlett and universally hated by all. Several times Kelly alone stands between Scarlett and death by the lynching method.

Finally Scarlett stabs a man and Kelly takes him to his cabin in the hills to hide. One day Scarlett shows his protector a clipping from one of the newspapers asking for information as to the whereabouts of Peter Hardyne Wilding, and stating that Silas Wilding's will has been made in his favor. Kelly is astonished to learn that the coward was his cousin, Peter Wilding, but, without revealing his own identity, he accepts the other's offer to go east and claim the estate in his name, for which service he is to receive one-half of the value of his uncle's property.

Just as the arrangements are completed a sheriff's posse is seen approaching the shack, and "Scarlett," weakened by years of dissipation and fear, succumbs to heart failure before their arrival.

Again assuming his rightful name of Peter Hardyne Wilding, Kelly goes east, proves his identity to the satisfaction of the lawyers, and lingers in New York a few days before taking up his residence at his Long Island home. He meets Polly Winthrop and marries her on the agreement that they are take each other at "face value." For some reason Polly seems horrified to learn that her husband's name is Peter Wilding. Other evidences of his cousin's wrong-doings are brought to his attention continually. He is suspected and shunned by his Long Island neighbors, but the one thing that really bothers him is that his wife treats him as an impostor. Patiently he bears it all.

One day the climax is reached in the visit of a mysterious man named Klawber, who repeatedly accuses him of not being the real Peter Wilding, and demands money, claiming to "have something on" Peter Wilding, and threatening to expose him. Thoroughly discouraged in his efforts to frighten his prey, Klawber is leaving when he sees Polly in the hall. Turning to Wilding he taunts him with having married the gang's clever girl accomplice.

The time of explanation at hand, Polly tells the story of her twin sister, who was started on the downward path by Peter Wilding, and who has since died. Wilding then tells the story of his meeting his cousin and the latter's tragic death. The couple are overjoyed to find that in "face value" they have fulfilled each other's ideals.

Standard Secures Exposition Rights

The Standard Film Corporation, a big company recently organized by prominent film interests and backed by Wall street financial men announces that it has closed a contract by which it secures the exclusive motion picture privileges and concessions of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition which will be held in San Francisco during 1915.

A tract of ground approximating five acres in area in one of the most desirable locations on the main amusement street in the concession district will be used by the Standard Company as its headquarters during the fair period. On this space will be erected a large first-class theater which will seat upwards of fifteen hundred people at one time and the first runs of the best features will be shown here. The balance of the ground will be occupied by a huge amphitheater and producing studios, stages and yards, where several producers and their companies will be kept busily engaged in the production of pictures.

Stanly H. Twist, well known in film circles, engineered the deal and closed the concession contracts on behalf of the Standard Film Corporation.

Changes In Italian Market

The year 1913 showed considerable progress in the cinematograph industry in Italy, not only in the widespread use of Italian films and the increased number of moving picture theaters, but also in the financial results obtained. The cinematograph is becoming more and more an Italian industry and foreign films are becoming fewer in Italy. Generally American films lost ground in Italy in 1913, fewer being exhibited than in former years.

Little Mouse Stars in Play of North

Unusual Selig Film

IT is not very often that we get a chance to see a pet mouse assume the leading role in a film production, but such is the case in the release of the Selig Polyscope Company for August 24. The little creature is the chief factor in the story's climax and has several close-up views taken of himself, the results of which are liable to make many of the reigning film favorites more or less anxious about their futures.

The film in which this new style of star appears is entitled "The White Mouse" and is one of the best of the series of far north pictures which have been done by this company. The atmosphere is typical of the land of ice and snow and the realistic work done in the exterior scenes must have cost the players a great deal of hardship.

Wheeler Oakman and Bessie Eyton assume the leads and portray their characters with their usual grace and charm. Tom Mix and Joe King have the only other roles which appear in the cast but the woman playing the part of the Indian squaw gave a splendid character delineation of the type.

The surveyor is attracted by Jean's beauty.

The story is highly dramatic in places and has plenty of action throughout, while one or two situations abound in heart interest. The scenes are well arranged and bring out all the crises clearly. The idea in its abstract form is fresh and the plot thoughtfully worked out as regards detailed action.

The story opens with the burning of Billy Silver's cabin while both he and his wife are away. Jean, the wife, returns in time to save their little baby from the flames but except a few bundles of furs they lose all that they possess. Billy cheers his wife up and placing her and the baby in the sled he starts on the long tramp to the settlement in search of work.

They arrive at their destination a few days later and Billy seeks work with a party of surveyors only to be turned down by Lawler, their chief. Lawler changes his mind when he sees Jean, however, as he instantly forms a plan to get her for himself. The next day a party of surveyors leave for the forest and Lawler orders Billy to go with them. As soon as they leave camp Lawler goes to Jean but she does not approve of his visit as she mistrusts him. He notices her feeling toward him and leaves her without making any advances.

The following day the surveyors discover they have left one of the charts needed in the work behind and Billy is sent back to get it. Lawler again comes to Jean's cabin and this time tells her she is going to be his. The little wife is terrified but she cannot escape from the brute before her and he snatches her to him just as Billy arrives in the camp. Jean screams and her husband hears her.

He dashes to her rescue and knocks the surveyor to the floor. His anger almost gets the best of him and he is about to kill the man but he controls himself and orders him from the hut. Lawler, however, does not go but instead springs at Billy and in the struggle which follows the surveyor is shot by the man who is protecting his wife. A member of the Mounted Police is in the settlement at the time and arrests Billy.

but the officer is stern and refuses to listen to her. The wife is desperate and plans the escape of Billy. She goes to him and tells him to surprise the guard and make his get-away and she will meet him with his snow shoes at the edge of the forest. Billy feigns sickness and when the guard bends over him he grapples with him and after knocking him unconscious, makes his escape.

Jean meets him as she promised and Billy starts his race for liberty. Sergeant Brokaw of the Mounted returns to the post and learns from his dazed comrade the story of Billy's escape and at once starts out to capture him. Billy reaches a deserted hut in the forest and takes refuge in it. As he is about to lie down he sees a little white mouse in the bunk. His first impulse is to kill it but when he sees it is tame he changes his mind and decides to make a pet of it.

The days drag by slowly and the loneliness of the life he is leading threatens to drive Billy insane. However, he becomes interested in the little mouse and for hours at a time his mind is diverted from his surroundings by the little creature's funny antics. In the meantime Sergeant Brokaw continues his search and little by little draws closer to Billy. Then the day comes when the officer of the law sees the smoke of the little cabin before him.

Cautiously he creeps up to the door and springs into the shack, surprising Billy as he sleeps. He binds his prisoner hand and foot and leaves him helpless in the bunk while he goes to get his sled which he left some distance from the cabin. While he is gone the little white mouse gets busy and, as though he knew the position of the man who has been his comrade, chews the ropes which bind his hands. When Brokaw returns Billy covers him and makes him a prisoner.

Knowing that he must move on the woodsman gathers his belongings together and hurries away to the South. It is a long trail but he gamely fights his way through the snow and finally arrives in the States. It takes a long time for him to get in touch with Jean but finally he succeeds and again the family are happily united and with them are several little white mice, pets that Billy declares he will always keep in remembrance of the little animal who saved him from unjust punishment.

The cast is as follows:

Billy Silver.....Wheeler Oakman
Jean .....Bessie Eyton
Lawler .....Joe King
Sergeant Brokaw.....Tom Mix

Olcott Gets Unique Irish Background

Few if any of the thousands of tourists who visit the beautiful Lakes of Killarney every year know why they have to ride seven miles through that wonderful bit of rugged country, the Gap of Dunloe, on ponies. After the trip is made, one can see that it might be possible to drive the big sight seeing coaches that take the tourists from Killarney to the entrance of the Gap up through the mountain gorge but it so happens that the spirit of Irish independence won't allow it.

The Sid Olcott company which is in Ireland for the summer making big features with real Irish atmosphere was recently told of a big local revolution which settled the Gap question about six years ago.

It seems that the Cook Company which owns the coaches, undertook to have its big sight seeing vehicles carry the tourists all the way to the Lakes one season, instead of riding the seven miles through the Gap on ponies. Then the pony boys, of whom there are about a hundred and fifty, quietly tore up the roads, took their rifles and from the mountain side shot down the horses of the coaches. The Irish constabulary was called out but the hardy mountaineers were too much for them and finally the company gave up.

Electricity Vital to Development

Interesting "Flying A" Subject

CONTAINING a truth of life, splendidly portrayed through a series of closely connected developing incidents, the two-reel release of the American Film Manufacturing Company for August 24, entitled "This Is the Life," is a production which is of more than mere entertainment value.

The relation of modernized methods, especially those in which electricity figures, to those of the old days when every little duty about the farm was performed by hand, forms the theme of this pleasing comedy drama and the convincing manner in which the plot has been rounded out, leaves no doubt as to the purpose of the picture.

Charlotte Burton, in the leading feminine role, that of a country girl, is delightfully natural in her acting, while Ed Coxen take the male lead in equally charming manner. George Fields completely loses his personality in the role of a hard-headed old farmer, who considers all modern improvements a waste of time, and the character portrayal further proves this actor's versatility. A number of the "Flying A" favorites appear in the supporting roles, all doing good work in their respective parts.

The lovers go to the garden.

The interior settings and the exterior locations on the farm are pleasing and abound in atmosphere. A number of new electrical inventions worked into the latter part of the second reel is a novelty in itself, while several larger engines seen earlier in the picture are also well worth notice, irrespective of their bearing upon the plot. The photography is of the best and the sub-titling and vision work well handled.

The story opens with a friendly call of the Browns upon the Millers, the families living on neighboring farms. Brown and Miller engage in a checker game, while John and Rita, their son and daughter, respectively, slip away to the garden. Mary Brown and Mrs. Miller are great friends and visit with each other on the porch. All goes very well and the young lovers in the garden have forgotten there are any other persons in the world until Brown finds himself cornered on the checker board and a quarrel between him and Miller results which leads to the sudden departure of the Brown family and the separation of the lovers.

Brown is set in his ideas and will not consider forgetting the matter. John is industrious and studies electricity when alone in his room. His father learns of this and angrily throws the books away, telling his son that the modern ideas are all a foolish waste of time, and that the only real way to do things is by the old methods.

John is determined to succeed in the work he has chosen, however, and that night leaves home to go to the city. He stops at the Miller home and says good-bye to Rita, telling her that he will return when he has made good. Brown disowns John. In the city he finds work oiling some huge electrical engines and, given this opportunity to study their construction, quickly learns the principles of the work. He continues his study during the evenings and it is not long before he is promoted.

On the Miller farm electricity replaces all the former slow and tedious methods, but Brown, although he has again established friendly relations with his neighbor, refuses to even consider any improvements in the methods he employs, and his daughter, Mary, is forced to do all her work by hand. Rita is sent to a boarding school in the city, and there John and her again see much of each other, and her company inspires him to even greater efforts. The spark of genius has been lying dormant in the young man and under the pressure of his daily work it appears, and it not long until he turns to invention.

Time passes and one after another of John's inventions become successful, but still his father refuses to forgive him for leaving home. Rita has returned home, but receives letters from John almost daily. The inventor is unable to leave his work, however, even for a moment, as he is now working on an X-ray machine which promises to become the greatest of its kind in the world.

Mary works far into every night in order to complete her household duties and in time the strain wears on her and she begs her father to get the many little modern inventions which would make her tasks lighter, but he stubbornly refuses. The frail girl does the best she can, but it is only a short time before the inevitable happens. One day as she is ironing a sharp pain shoots up her back and she falls to the floor in a faint. Rita has just come to the Brown home to visit Mary and finds her in agony. It is now that Brown begins to realize the worth of the modern inventions, and when Rita secures a doctor by telephone he is very thankful. The doctor, however, can do nothing for the girl and says that she will be paralyzed for life.

Again Brown sees the wonderful uses of electricity when Rita reaches John in the city over the long distance telephone and asks him to come to his sister's aid with his latest invention, the X-ray, and a specialist. While the little party consisting of the Miller family and Brown anxiously wait in the little farm house, the son who had been disowned speeds homeward in an automobile, and as soon as he arrives the doctor and he start to work on the stricken girl with the new invention. Brown waits outside the door of the room, anxiously praying for the best, and when half an hour later the pair come from within and announce that through the medium of John's wonderful X-ray the girl will be restored to health, Brown repents and forgets all the malice he has felt towards his son.

A short time later Mary is again well, and when she is able to work again she finds all the modern conveniences at her command and is surprised on the day of John's and Rita's wedding when her father calls for her in an electric automobile. He is highly pleased with the new mode of living he has adopted and enthusiastically exclaims "This is th' Life."

The cast for the production is as follows:

Farmer Brown.....Geo. Field
His Son.....Ed. Coxen
Farmer Miller.....John Steppling
His Daughter.....Charlotte Burton
Farmer Brown's Daughter.....Edith Borella
Farmer Miller's Wife.....Josephine Ditt

New Version of "Uncle Tom's Cabin"

Harriet Beecher Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is undoubtedly one of the most widely read books that America has ever known. It gained great prominence at the time of the Civil war and has often been referred to as one of the strongest blows dealt slavery.

Millions have heard the story, many have read it, but comparatively few have seen it staged and then not in a manner to do it justice, as its variety of seasons and scenes, especially the winter scenes, make it a play ill-adapted to legitimate stage production.

In the five-reel photoplay version, however, which is now being released by the World Film Corporation, we see all the outdoor scenes clothed in their natural garment whether it be sunshine or snow and ice. Nothing of importance is omitted. Eliza crosses the Ohio river on floating cakes of ice which rock and dip unded her weight, forcing her to run the whole distance to prevent being thrown into the river; Little Eva slips from the wharf into the water while attempting to walk on the edge of the plank and is rescued by Uncle Tom; an old flat-bottomed, end-wheel steamer carries Simon Legree and his newly purchased group of slaves down the river to his plantation; the negroes are shown at work in the fields, and Legree's housekeeper and Emeline are seen making their escape through the swamp pursued by their master's hounds.

Numbers of other southern scenes could be cited which are alive with action and typical of the country in the period in which the story is founded. About all that is lacking in the pantomime production is the southern dialect, but the correct atmosphere obtained in the staging more than makes up for that. The death of Little Eva is easily the most pathetic and one of the strongest scenes in the picture.

The cast numbers twenty-four, chief among whom are Sam Lucas as Uncle Tom, Marie Eline as Little Eva, Teresa Michelena as Eliza, Irving Cummings as George Harris, Paul Scardon as Mr. Haley, Garfield Thompson as Mr. St. Clair and Roy Applegate as Simon Legree. William Robert Daly directed the picture.

"Terrance O'Rourke" Stories Coming

Film rights to the popular "Terrance O'Rourke" stories, by Louis Joseph Vance, the distinguished writer and author of the "Trey O' Hearts" series, have been acquired by the Universal company and production will begin immediately with J. Warren Kerrigan in the title role.

Although the stories will constitute a series, each film will be complete in itself and to enjoy and appreciate them will not necessitate having seen the previous features in the series. Few, if any, works of modern fiction have created a deeper and more pleasant impression upon all English-speaking people than the O'Rourke stories. They are stories of adventure and in the character of Terrance O'Rourke is found the most pleasing, cleancut, gentleman adventurer who ever entertained an audience bent upon being thrilled, enchanted and bodily carried away into the world of romance and heart-throb.

"The Empire of Illusio" will be the first of the O'Rourke stories to be produced. It will be remembered that it is in this charming tale that O'Rourke sets out from the boulevards of Paris to found an empire on the sands of the Sahara.

On the Outside Looking In

By the Goat Man

IT had been more than a year since I roamed about the Vitagraph lot to any great extent. I dropped in one evening last June, but that didn't count. This more recent visit to the Vitagraph plant in Brooklyn gave me time to go up and down stairs and into the basements of the various buildings. With Sam Spedon as guide, lecturer and master of ceremonies, we did all the stunts. There were more evidences of making films than I had ever seen before at any one place. Indoors and out, upstairs and downstairs, group after group of actor folk were doing scenes. Out in the lot there was Wally Van in the roughest kind of company. I was more than shocked for Wally is such a nice little chap. He wasn't in the scene at all. He was sitting on a can of nitroglycerine and with a bunch of yellow paper in his hands. By his side was the camera man and out front were dozens of horny-handed. long haired pirates planning to scuttle a ship. Wally Van was director for this picture and he told me it was more than interesting work. ¶Upstairs, I ran across Flora Finch and John Bunny doing a scene in a doctor's shop. Flora Finch was fearful that she would lose her "old man" and the doc. was using a stethoscope on Bunny and testing out that great body to prove that it was germ-laden. Of course John knew he wasn't sick and that was to be the cue for a laugh when you see him on the screen. I went along with John to his dressing room, which is merely that, for it isn't in any sense a make-up room. John Bunny is always made-up. His quarters are a store house for wearing apparel. It is never locked for John's clothes are John's clothes. Nobody borrows his things.

What impressed me more particularly, aside from the great activity of the exceptionally large force of actor folks, was the building of a new factory. There is in process of erection at the Vitagraph works, the largest film manufactory I have seen. The building is to be forty-five by two hundred feet, full four stories and basement. All of the shops are to go into this new building and the space now used for similar work will be taken over for other purposes. The new building will be fireproof throughout, the problems of ventilation and light having been carefully considered. If my theory of a complete program has merit the Vitagraph Company is equipped to turn out theirs without the aid or consent of any other nation on earth.

I met Clara Kimball Young in the garb of an aviatrix. She was disappointed because her flight was to be postponed. Later, I saw her aeroplane, the Humdinger, a yellow daub of paper and canvas that couldn't fly on a bet. Miss Young's tears made no impression on me. Nor on her, for that matter, for it was all in the day's work.

Previously, John Bunny had invited me to ride back to New York with him and while I continued on with Spedon, Bunny loafed with his cigar. Finally we piled into John's car—a big touring Stutz—and were off. ¶You have heard that John Bunny's indeterminate leave of absence from Vitagraph was effective August 15, and that he would tour the world, heading his own company of sixty odd people. The war on the continent will not affect John Bunny's world tour plans for he expected to do the United States first. The country John has made famous looks good to him. Europe can go as far as it likes, just so it settles down in time for Bunny's tour over there which is more than a year away. ¶There is one thought in John's mind that isn't generally known. This great, lovable actor has realized for a long time that the public wants something better in film offerings. Getting out among the people, he will learn exactly what is wanted. His world tour has a reason back of it that isn't measured by the almighty dollar. Bunny wants to do more serious work and he will use the world as a big school for himself and by reason of his study he hopes later to accomplish his ideals. ¶But perhaps you never rode with Bunny in his car. A parade headed by a dozen brass bands can attract no larger ovation. Everybody knows John Bunny and his big brown Stutz. Crossing coppers reverse the traffic signals and let him through when they see him—and they always see him and speak to him as he whizzes past. Little east side "wops" scream at him; girls in office building windows wave their handkerchiefs; truck drivers yell at him. If it is in human form and alive, it recognizes the Big, Funny, Sunny, Money Bunny. Only the blind miss him and that's a pity. ¶I asked John how many times he had died and if he could account for the ever prevailing story that he was a dead one. He laughed back that he had been buried authentically seven distinct times—really put away for good—but he couldn't tell why, unless he was such a bad performer! This is official: John Bunny is very much alive. He is not the husband of Mrs. Flora Finch. He lives in his beautiful home in Flatbush with his very own Mrs. John Bunny and his two strapping big sons.

New York is a regular old woman's town in some respects. Incredible things are happening every hour. A lot of mis-statements get into the trade journals. A lot of people are tangled up with the business who have no right or license to be considered. They prattle everything they hear, add some thrills of their own and take it all for granted. Long before Tom Ince and Mack Sennett reached New York, the whole film rialto had them placed in seventeen new positions. No one seemed to care what the feelings of Messrs. Ince and Sennett were, or what they might have to offer in person. It was easy for me to find out that neither of them had had a vacation for a long time and that they were coming to New York to see whether Ad Kessel had changed the color scheme of the office decorations. ¶It is common gossip every third Tuesday morning to find a reorganization at the Strand, but it doesn't happen at all and on the hottest nights the police hold the mob in line in front of America's de luxe picture house. The Strand is one of those exceptional houses that confines itself to motion pictures, changes the bill once a week and holds 'em out at 50 cents per. And yet we are told that ten reels for a nickel and a daily change is necessary! When New York will make a fuss about the things that actually happen, it will give us greater pleasure.

As I go along I'm beginning to realize that the question of film publicity is being very sadly neglected. The tremendous output of the manufacturer has made it necessary to increase the force in practically all departments—except around the vicinity of the dopester's desk. Every film should be worth its song of praise. If it is worth making at all it is worth making well. If it is a good film, it should share honors with the rest of the output. Because it happens to be a short length, it seldom gets a hearing. The big noise centers around the long lengths. That is because the big one costs more—the bosses have heard about it—they have been besieged for this and that item of extra cost. When it is finished, the dopester must gird up his loins and rally some clippings into his scrap book, awaiting the call from the front office. To do that, he must neglect work equally important. The dopester is crying for a larger force—a larger appropriation for advertising. Given more money to spend he can command a larger force of trained helpers to give him what he must have—a run for his money. Advertising in trade journals begets service and it is a service that counts.

Room 32, the Marlborough-Blenheim is headquarters of the New York m. p. exhibitors and it is one of the busy spots on Broadway. I found time to pay my respects at headquarters the day that Marion S. Pearce succeeded to the job that M. A. Neff had selected for his eternal own. The ceremonies were simple and business-like. It was there decreed that both the News and the World would henceforth use Mr. Pearce's initials and drop the use of "M. A." in connection with Pearce's name. ¶At room 32 there were exhibitors old and tried and prospective exhibitors seeking information and slathers of expert advice. There was also Samuel H.

Trigger who joined me in a bumper of Dubonnet and asked what must be done to get a large exhibitor membership.

Those of you who follow me—and since Motography is weekly the following grows—know what I think about m. p. exhibitors' organizations. I have seen every national convention. I have tried to find out why men would travel long distances to attend the annual meetings. I have never heard the answer.

Pauline Frederick in Rome during the making of the Famous Players' film "The Eternal City."

The money that should be conserved for the expenses of constructive work is frittered away in entertainment of one kind or another. After the yearly pow-wow the treasury is depleted and when a real problem faces the organization it must depend on a few to finance the necessary work. This isn't set down here as criticism of the adverse sort. It is mere statement of fact. It is not unlike the conditions that obtained during the early, formative days of all co-operative bodies. ¶The national organization will find a way to recruit its membership the moment it adopts a plan that will be broad enough to render actual service to all motion picture exhibitors. Then our conventions will be attended by an eager throng of live wires who will be glad to pay for their own entertainment—buy their own banquet tickets—blow their own bazoos. Aside from the entertainment offered and the fun that has attended the election of officers, conventions thus far have accomplished very little.

Peple Sees "Littlest Rebel"

Edward Peple, the author of "The Littlest Rebel," who is in Chicago looking after the welfare of "A Pair of Sixes," was an interested spectator at the Studebaker theater Monday afternoon, to view his Civil War draa in motion pictures. Mr. Peple was accompanied by Oza Waldrop, a member of "A Pair of Sixes" company, and Edgar MacGregor, who staged "The Littlest Rebel" and "A Pair of Sixes."

Mr. Peple was intensely fascinated throughout the action of the play and declared that the photo play duplicate was "as intense in its stirring scenes as the original production." He thought that the photo play would be improved by the addition of lines and titles which he furnished before he left the play house.

Pictures Popular in Singapore

Vice Consul General Caspar L. Dreier, of Singaport, Straits Settlements, says in a recent consular report:

"The popularity of the cinematograph in the East is yet another instance of the adoption of western ideas by a people whose supposed indifference to the march of civilization has become a theme for poets. This latest form of relaxation has become firmly established in the favor of Singaporeans, and those in a position to know predict a great future for it in the colony.

"Singapore was by no means behind the rest of the world in its adoption of the bioscope. Many years have elapsed since the cinematograph was first introduced to local residents in a small show on High street, and the surprise of the native population when they witnessed pictures moving and performing acts which seemed more in place in actual life can much more easily be imagined than described. There are now five picture houses in this city, and in a short time more will be added to the number. Some of the buildings used for motion-picture purposes are ordinary frame structures with thatched roofs.

"An interesting feature of local cinematograph theaters is the way they cater to the poorer native classes, by arranging benches made of planks at the rear of the stage or screen. Admission to this part of the house is 10 cents local currency or about 5.7 cents United States gold, and it is not unusual to have nearly a thousand people witnessing the pictures from the other side. They are compelled, of course, to view the picture backward, but it seems to make little difference, as they do not read the English description and receive their sole amusement from the attractiveness of the picture itself. This feature is depended on by the theaters for a goodly portion of their revenue. Admission to the front part of the building seems exorbitant compared with similar shows in the United States, the general price being $2 local currency, or $1.14 American.

"A luxuriously appointed building has just been opened in Orchard Road. It is quite modern in construction, with balcony and boxes, but the custom here is rather the reverse of that in America, in that the ground floor is for the natives, while the first balcony with tiers of boxes on each side of the house and also a row of boxes at the rear of the balcony provide the first-class accommodations. The scale of prices for this new theater is $1.14 (United States) in the boxes, $0.85 in the balcony, $0.28 for the ground floor, and $0.14 for the space behind the screen.

"As stated, in addition to the five more or less modern picture houses here at present the construction of another one, larger and more elaborate in design than those now in use, will soon be begun. This will be the new Alhambra, which will be erected by Mr. Tan Cheng Kee, who is also the owner of other picture houses. Through the instrumentality of this consulate an order has been placed with an American firm for the chairs with which to equip this new theater. This is the first instance where the United States has been favored for such furniture, the order being for 800 or more chairs, some of which are of an expensive type. The new theater is to accommodate about 2,000 people in the front of the house and an equal number, if not more, in the space behind the screen.

"As regards the supply of films, Pathé Fréres have a branch distributing office here, and, in addition, there are one or two other agencies conducting exchanges which furnish the houses with many American films as well as French and other makes."

Miss Greenwood Recovers

Winifred Greenwood received a warm and hearty welcome when she reported last week for duty. Miss Greenwood is taking the leading role of "Lola," a two reel subject now being produced by the American Film Manufacturing Company, under the direction of Henry Otto. This is her first appearance in pictures for nearly a month, she having been severely injured in a motorcycle accident.

Miss Greenwood has been the recipient of numerous letters from all over the country inquiring as to her health and expressing a sincere hope for her speedy recovery.

Wears Costly Jewels

That realism has become the rule of Essanay photoplays is shown in "Under Royal Patronage," a new and thrilling two-act drama which is to be released in the near future. Many of the scenes are laid in the royal palace of the German emperor and real gowns and real jewels are necessary. The Essanay Company, when it finally approved the scenario, immediately placed orders for more than $25,000 worth of furniture. And Miss Beverly Bayne, who plays the leading role opposite Francis X. Bushman, raided the family jewel chest and throughout the play was adorned with gems said to have cost not less than $15,000. The gowns worn by Miss Bayne are also declared to have been the most elaborate ever shown in a photoplay.

Famous Players Release "Aftermath"

The next release of the Famous Players Film Company is to be the powerful domestic drama by Professor William Addison Hervey, of Columbia University, "Aftermath." The film version of this noted play of American life is splendidly enacted by the celebrated leading lady, Miss Virginia Pearson, and the picture star, Owen Moore, supported by a consistently capable cast.

"Aftermath" is a modern drama of error and atonement, the story of two souls that emerge from the depths. Ruth Morgan and Allan Buchannan, two unfortunate victims of evil and despair, are both drawn to the river's brink, seeking merciful oblivion.

The two waifs of misfortune, thus strangely thrown together, turn away from death and begin their struggle back to hope and faith together. Allan becomes of service to a wealthy man, who secures him a position that enables him to marry Ruth, and shortly after the wedding Ruth learns that her husband's benefactor is the man of her past. Overwhelmed by the crushing revelation, Allan thrusts her from him, and the aftermath of the terrible past seems about to engulf both, when, through a thrilling combination of circumstances, Allan learns to forgive, and the two emerge from the shadows that lay behind them, into a wonderful happiness.

The production is in four reels, with never a pause of interest from the leader to the terrific climax of the story.

Hutchinson in Switzerland

Word comes by cable via London that S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company, accompanied by Mrs. Hutchinson and their two sons, Hobart and Winston, are in Switzerland. All avenues of egress excepting via Italy and the Mediterranean Sea are cut off, but no anxiety is experienced as the Swiss government is well able to care for all tourists within its boundaries. Every possible precaution has been taken by the home office of the American Film Manufacturing Company, to insure the safety and comfort of Mr. Hutchinson and his family. The hospitality of the genial Swiss is a matter of history, so no uneasiness is felt at the general offices of the company in Chicago.

Twist Buys Shipman Interests

It was announced this week that Stanly H. Twist and Ernest Shipman, who have been closely associated during the past two years in different film propositions, have discontinued their partnership. Twist has purchased Shipman's stock in the Inter-Ocean Sales Company, whose offices are located in the World's Tower building, New York City, and has taken over all of his present film interests and marketing contracts. Mr. Twist states the reason for Mr. Shipman's temporary retirement from business is ill health and a desire to concentrate on some personal plans which he prefers not to make public yet.

Sawyer Gets Liberty Films

The Liberty Motion Picture Company, Inc., in which a number of wealthy Philadelphians are interested, has signed contracts with the A. H. Sawyer Company who will market the forthcoming Liberty feature photoplays.

The Sawyer Company has obtained the exclusive rights for all "Liberty" releases that will be exhibited in the United States. A number of multiple reel photoplays are now being prepared at the Liberty laboratories.

New Program Progressing

Lewis J. Selznick and his associates are getting ready to put on twenty-eight releases a week, single and multiple—four a day, and have contracted with some of the largest and foremost American manufacturers and American stars to supply them with products. Arrangements have been completed to handle the output through the offices of the World Film Corporation, whose organization now comprises twenty-five offices throughout the United States and Canada.

Kleine Confiscates Spurious Print

One day last week George Kleine had a government marshal seize a spurious print of "The Golden Beetle," an especially strong four-part subject which a concern called the Quality Feature Film Company was offering to New York theaters. The print was picked up at the Dixie Theater, 963 Prospect avenue, Bronx.

EDNA MAYO started her stage career as a wee little Miss Charming when she was just five years old. Later when she was a really grown up young lady she took prominent parts in "The Girlies," "Folies Bergere," "Madam X," "Excuse Me," and "Help Wanted." Miss Mayo's artistic tastes do not end with the stage. She is an ardent sculptress and spends a great deal of her spare time in following the artistic inclinations of her fancy. A nature loving, athletic sort of girl, she delights in all of the outdoor sports. Swimming, boating, tennis, and horseback riding are her favorites. Her daring has made her a popular screen artist, but a number of times has nearly been her own undoing. One of her narrowest escapes occurred at Seattle when she was thrown from an ungovernable horse at the edge of a precipice while working before a Pathe camera.

CHARLES ARLING is a pioneer moving picture actor and although still a young man his experience on the legitimate stage has been vast and varied. He was leading baritone in grand and comic opera on the Pacific Coast for two seasons, quit singing to join James T. Powers' production of "San Toy," and has assisted such stars as Francis Wilson, Richard Golden and Blanche Walsh. Mr. Arling's last speaking part was with Lulu Glaser in the Shubert production "Just One of the Boys." Mr. Gasnier, Pathe's chief director, saw the show and immediately said "There's a man we want." Mr. Arling proved the wisdom of Mr. Gasnier's choice by scoring in every part for which he has been cast. He finds himself most at home in comedies, but his ability shows equally well in dramas as will be admitted by anyone witnessing "Detective Craig's Coup."

PAUL PANZER was born in Warsburg, Bavaria, the well known university town. He studied at the University of Wurzburg and served in the army and became a lieutenant of the artillery in reserves. He left Germany to take a position as administrator of a coffee plantation in St. Palo in Brazil. After three and a half years spent there he came to this country twelve years ago. Inasmuch as he had been a leading spirit in club theatricals in Germany he naturally drifted into the dramatic profession and secured an engagement with Augustin Daly and later became stage manager. About five years ago he became interested in moving pictures and for awhile was an independent producer and director. Receiving, however, a flattering offer from Pathe Freres he joined their stock company in Jersey City where he has been now for three and a half years playing leading parts.

DELLA CONNOR, whose blonde locks and attractive smile grace so many Pathe comedies, was born in Boston, the city of culture. She was educated in the public schools of that city and through her sister, Mildred Barry, a vaudeville artiste, went on the stage. Her first engagement was with Lederer's "Sally in our Alley." At that time she was only 14 years old. She was then at the Herald Square Theater, New York for four years with the Fields. Two years at the Casino followed, this time as ingenue with Sam Bernard. Then came an engagement with Gus Edwards in "The Matinee Idol." Moving pictures then claimed her and she came to Jersey City to be a member of the Pathe stock company. Miss Connor finds her most congenial work in comedies and it is in that field that she stars with Pathe.

"Avenging Conscience" Pleases

A wonderful film has entertained the patrons of the Strand theater for a week's run and a wonderful musical program accompanied it. The film was David W. Griffith's "Avenging Conscience"; the accompaniment was that of S. L. Rothapfel's arrangement, and together, they made an offering of unusual merit.

Mr. Griffith's inspiration for this six-reel picture that holds with its tenseness and startles with its reality, came from the poems of Edgar Allen Poe; "Tell-Tale Hearts" and "Annabel Lee" furnishing the main thought. The imagery of Mr. Griffith himself, however, was responsible for the new story and its route to the hearts and imagination of its spectators. Seldom has a story gripped with so intense a hold as does this new film-tale which has come out of the West.

It is the opinion of many, however, that with fewer cut-backs and less of the allegorical, to which perhaps one hundred feet of the film's finish is given over, the "Avenging Conscience" would benefit. One particularly big and acceptable thing that it does is to give a big role to Henry Walthall; and with it, Mr. Walthall rises to what, perhaps, is his master work, so far, in pictures. Spottiswoode Aiken makes the character of the uncle one of commendable reality and Blanche Sweet, as the nephew's sweetheart, pleases a public that already likes her. George Seigmann as the Italian does splendid work, as also does Ralph Lewis as the detective. Mae Marsh made the minor appearance offered her distinctive for its worth and Robert Harron played a part opposite her.

The music, while fine throughout, is especially detective and the nephew; the latter at first confident that he can keep his awful secret—the murder of his uncle. Instead of using the violent third-degree method, the detective goes to the other extreme and works on his victim by reserve and power of suggestion. In the quiet room the clock ticks its message, "How like the beating of your uncle's heart." The detective taps the table with his pencil; again the message reaches the guilty man's conscience. Stealthily his hand creeps to that of the detective and stills it. Then it is the tapping of the latter's foot—and the guilty conscience bursts its bounds and the murderer, deranged, sees in a vision the fate that is to be his in the hereafter.

The music while fine throughout, is especially telling in these tense scenes and adds infinitely to value of them.

While it is a relief, as far as the subject of the story is concerned, for the spectators to learn that the thrilling tale they have witnessed is but a dream—otherwise there would have been no excuse for its being, no moral to its telling—yet, to many the fact of its being a dream was disappointing.

The story had to do with the love of a man and a girl; the man was his uncle's protege and the uncle was jealous of whatever outside affection the young man formed. He showed his displeasure toward the girl and she and the young man decided to part. Then youth and love called its lesson to the old man on every side, and he went home to think the matter over; so also did his nephew. The story of the latter's choking the old man, concealing his body in the fire-place, inheriting the dead man's wealth, the visitation of remorse, then the detective's ruse to make him confess, and his taking refuge in a barn where he stood his pursuers at bay and finally, his hanging himself to cheat the law of its prey, unfold and it is at this point that he awakes to find his uncle alive; the girl comes to say that uncle or no uncle she cannot live without him and the old man is pleased to give the young couple his blessing.

Pathe Employes go to War

At least one large American corporation has felt the burden of war in the loss of employes and that is the American branch of the great French house of Pathe Freres. Though the majority of the employes in this country are Americans there are, as natural, a number of Frenchmen in different departments, chief of whom are the ranking officers of the company, Messrs. Arthur Roussel and L. P. Bonvillain, the two vice presidents. When the call went out from the French consul in New York for reservists to return to the colors, practically all of these Frenchmen received the call. Mr. Bonvillain, who is a sous-lieutenant in the French army, sails on Saturday to rejoin his regiment. A touch of pathos is added to his departure since it means separation from his young wife and infant son. Mr. Roussel is ill with pneumonia and the news of the war has been kept from him for fear of aggravating an already serious condition.

Mr. Bardet, the cashier, has sent his two sons who sailed on the Lorraine. With them were Mr. Monca, sous-lieutenant in the French army, and son of chief director Monca of the Vincennes studio, various office clerks, cameramen, actors, directors and men in every department of the business.

The last private advices received from France by the house were to the effect that the huge factory in Joinville-le-Pont not far from Paris, had been requisitioned by the government as a barracks for the soldiers.

Willat Studios Completed

The Willat Studios and Laboratories, Inc., has just completed its new plant at Main street and Linwood avenue, Fort Lee, N. J. It consists of two modern studios and a factory building.

C. A. ("Doc") Willat, who is known as one of the best technical experts in the country, will be in personal command of the entire plant. Until a short time ago he was the technical director of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, and for many years previous to that time he managed and directed, in a very successful manner, the entire output of the Imp Company.

The factory building is about 100 feet wide by 150 feet deep; two stories high, and the entire construction is of brick and concrete, making it absolutely fireproof.

The studios are 60x120 feet each, and are 53 feet high. They are almost entirely enclosed in plain plate glass. The dressing rooms, etc., are located along the side of each studio. A tank, 15x25 feet, is constructed in the floor for water and trap scenes. The very latest devices for artificial lighting have been installed.

Associated with Mr. Willat in this enterprise is Charles O. Baumann, well known to everyone in the motion picture industry for his many progressive ideas.

The executive offices of the Willat Studios and Laboratories, Inc., are located in Suite 910-911-912, Longacre building, and the personnel of the officers of the company is as follows: Charles O. Bauman, president; Arthur Butler Graham, vice-president; C. A. Willat, secretary and treasurer.

Coward Redeems Himself on Battle Field

"Northern Lights" Pleases

THE five-part feature, "Northern Lights," offered by the Life Photo Film Corporation, is the successor to "The Greyhound." The new picture had its initial showing on the morning of August 7 at the American theater, New York, and the large audience passed cards of admission into the keeping of costumed Indians and filed past the receiving line, which was headed by Edward M. Roskam, the company's president.

An orchestra of twelve pieces accompanied the film's showing, which was one of western life in the time that the Indian was still partly master of the plains. The story hinges upon the scenes which mark the film's beginning, and these first scenes explain the film's right to the use of the descriptive term, "psychological drama." The story is one with an interesting theme and the characters, already known to the public for their work in previous releases by this company, are seen to whatever advantage their respective parts allow them.

There is no particular honor attached to the role of army deserter, yet Harry Spingler portrays such a character. And that is the one with which the spectators sympathize, because Wallace Grey—Mr. Spingler's characterization—is panic-stricken at the sound of guns and war as the result of pre-natal influence. Captain Grey, father of Wallace, had been injured on the battlefield and Wallace was marked with the fear that had seized his mother upon her learning of her husband's injury.

As a boy, Wallace displayed this fear at a Fourth of July celebration, and when a man left his companion, Florence Dunbar, to the kindness of other friends on an occasion of some Indian firing upon a stage in which they are traveling. His mother dead, there is but one person who understands the cause of this seeming cowardice, and this person is the young Indian, Swiftwind, with whom Wallace attended college. Swiftwind is a graduate physician and is made assistant to Dr. Sherwood at the same post at which Wallace's father, now colonel, is in charge. Florence Dunbar and her sister, Dorothy, are the colonel's wards, and Wallace is in love with Florence, the elder. All three are en route to the colonel's post when the attack by the Indians is made, and Wallace, taking one of the horses, rides frantically away from the scene of the attack.

He is ashamed to face his father and the two girls, so enlists in a regiment at another post, hoping to rid himself of his trait of cowardice. But in the first skirmish he takes part in the old fear seizes him and he rides in the opposite direction from his comrades and escapes.

Word is sent to the different posts regarding the deserter, and because he had deserted in time of battle, the colonel, not knowing the deserter to be his son, declares his punishment will be death, should he be captured. Swiftwind finds Wallace and keeps the fact secret, hoping to get him away. But the latter decides death would be better than the knowledge that he is a hunted thing, and gives himself up to the colonel.

Dr. Sherwood induces Florence to marry him, meanwhile, without thinking it necessary to tell her that he had fled from Germany because a germ he had administered to his former wife in time of illness had been supposed to be fatal.

Sherwood flees to the states to escape the responsibility of his wife's death. She has not died, however, and when, a traveler in the states, she is introduced into the Sherwood home, and the doctor again wishes possession of her and decides to rid himself of his second wife by allowing her to mistake cholera germs for morphine. But the germs are unwittingly administered to himself and he frees his wife by his own death.

The Indians in uprising believe that success is with them owing to the heavens blazing the Northern Lights. They decide to offer a truce flag and then to massacre the garrison on its acceptance. Swiftwind learns of this plan and rides to save his white friends. He dies from exhaustion and privation, on reaching the fort, and Wallace begs to carry the message to his father and a small band at the mercy of the Indians in a distant pass, and thinks thus to redeem himself in the eyes of the colonel. He succeeds and the deed gives him mastery over the fear that has been with him since birth.

He is now honorably entitled to marry Florence, whose sister, Dorothy, has already chosen a prospective life partner from among the colonel's men, and Helen Dare, the doctor's first wife, has followed suit.

The scenes and settings suggest well the atmosphere of the story, and the tale of battle is suggested by riderless horses rather than body-strewn fields. This is one of the novel features of the film.

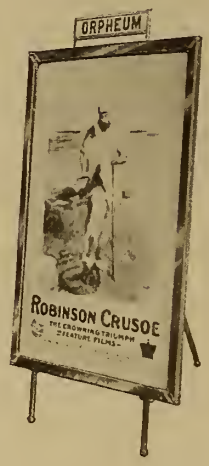
The cast is as follows:

Florence Sherwood	Iva Shepard
Dr. Sherwood	William H. Tooker
Wallace Grey	Harry Spingler
Horton (a scout)	David Wall
Lieut. Charles	George De Carlton
Col. Grey	Harry Knowles
Dorothy Dunbar (Little Major)	Anna Laughlin
Helen Dare	Katherine La Salle
"Swiftwind"	William Sorelle

The Movies as a Training School

"Actions speak louder than words," quoted Fernando Michelena recently in discussing the advantages that accrue to an opera singer who spends time in studying and playing for the moving pictures. His daughter, Beatriz Michelena, who is acknowledged to be one of the best sopranos on the American stage is at present the star of the California Motion Picture Corporation's productions which are soon to be placed before the public. She has assumed the leading roles in "Salomy Jane," "Mignon," "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" and several other film presentations shortly to be offered to the world from the corporation's splendid studio near San Rafael.

Fernando Michelena will easily be recalled by the opera loving public of America as one of the greatest tenors that ever sang "Faust," and as leading tenor for Emma Abbott during that beloved artist's halcyon days of song.



"I entirely approve of my daughter's venture into the motion picture art, for it means the development of precisely those faculties for acting that are usually ignored by opera singers—I mean histrionic faculties.

"No word is uttered, yet the artist must make her meaning plain. She must demonstrate the truth of the adage, as I have said that 'actions speak louder than words.' A singer may render his lines with all the vocal expression that ever a tenor brought to the wonderful melody from 'Faust,' but how often does one hear them sung with the pantomimic expression that should match the fervor of the words? Very seldom. Very well, that is what the motion picture teaches. No aid of melody, nor even of prosaic speech is lent to the artist. She must so enact the scene that the thought is conveyed vivid and distinct through the medium of the only universal language—pantomime."

Another Newman Frame

A unique and tasty lobby frame that combines the maximum of efficiency with a minimum cost is now a part of the regular stock supply of the Newman Manufacturing Company of Cincinnati. Sidney Newman, sales manager for his company, sends the information that this frame in competition with other well known makes has booked the orders almost without exception during the past two months. The brass border of this frame is laid over solid oak, which prevents denting or otherwise marring the frame. The backboard is made of a good quality light basswood and fastened with the Newman patented quick detachable device. It fits snugly against the glass and no thumb tacks are necessary to hold the posters properly. The new catalog describes this and other frames, giving net prices.

Ramo War Film Nearing Completion

Taking advantage of the present tense situation in Europe the Ramo Films Inc. has secured a new play from the pen of Paul M. Potter, the noted dramatist, the plot of which revolves about the great conflict of 1914. The play, which is entitled "The War of Wars" teems with dramatic situations and to add to the interest there are a number of actual battle scenes which were taken two weeks ago on the Alsatian frontier showing the Franco-German invasion.

It has been through the utmost effort on the part of author, producer and players that the finished product will be ready for the market during the coming week. All have been keyed up to the highest pitch since work on the production commenced and the artistic effects which have been secured are said to be amazing.

The laboratory force has been working day and night, developing and printing the films as fast as they are taken and the cutting department is kept busy fitting the battle scenes into the battle scenes. The production promises to be one of the most complete and timely subjects ever turned out by this firm.

A De Luxe Brochure

One of the most interesting bits of advertising matter that has been received by Motography of late comes from Raths & Seavolt, industrial film manufacturers of St. Paul, Minnesota. It is a twelve page booklet descriptive of modern logging as carried on by the Industrial Lumber Company at Elizabeth, Louisiana, and explaining in detail the filming of this tremendous industry by Messrs. Raths and Seavolt.

The paper used in the booklet is the best that can be obtained, while the text matter is breezy enough to hold one's attention to the end and the illustrations are bound to instantly attract anyone casually picking up the brochure and cause him to read every line of the advertising matter. The cover is a light grayish brown paper which will not easily soil and stiff enough to stand the ordinary wear and tear. Messrs. Raths and Seavolt are to be complimented both upon the make-up of their advertising matter and the interesting pictures they seem to have obtained.

Kleine Books War Film

George Kleine is now booking a highly interesting and timely four-reel war film entitled: "European Armies in Action." The subject shows many splendid views of the soldiers and sailors now engaged and is varied enough in subject matter to be highly acceptable to audiences of all kinds. Some of the matter contained is: Glimpses of his Imperial Highness, Crown Prince Francis Ferdinand of Austria reviewing the Austrian Military Forces; The French Army in Action; Life Aboard a French Battleship; German Artillery Manoeuvers; Belgium Cavalry in Action; The Servian and Montenegrin Armies; British Field Gun Evolutions; Swiss Army Manoeuvers; How Thirteen-Inch Guns are Manufactured. This film is being booked through the various Kleine offices around the country.

Ad Film Committee Re-elected

At the third informal conference of moving picture advertising specialists and manufacturers which was held at the Hotel Claridge, New York City, July 29 and 30, the following members of the national committee, who were appointed at the Chicago meeting held at La Salle Hotel in January, were unanimously re-elected: Watterson R. Rothacker of the Industrial Moving Picture Co., Charles Stark of the Essanay Film Mfg. Co., and J. Alexander Leggett of the Pathescope Company.

It was tentatively decided to have the next meeting of the National Committee at San Francisco in February, 1915, although it is probable that a special meeting will be called for either Chicago or New York in August.

Selig to Film "The Ne'er Do Well"

Preliminary arrangements are being made for the production of the great, special feature, "The Ne'er Do Well," from the novel by Rex Beach, by the Selig Polyscope Company, which calls for a trip to the Panama canal and an entire season's work in that torrid zone by Director Colin Campbell and company. Mr. Campbell says he will have all details arranged to the dot by September.

One of the most prominent features in the line of advertising matter to be supplied for the coming All Star Feature Corporation's production "The Nightingale" in which Ethel Barrymore makes her debut in motion pictures, is the musical score which has been compiled by Manuel Klein, the musical director of the New York Hippodrome.

SERIAL FEATURES.

SERIAL stories in popular magazines and serial feature films in motion picture theaters, on superficial consideration, appear to be almost identical in their appeal to the public. But there is revealed upon analysis an important difference which has a vital effect upon the success of the serial film.

The serial story appears in approximately equal installments at regular intervals on printed pages. The reader thus has a choice of several different methods of reading it. If he absorbs one installment at a time, he has a choice of several days—the number depending on the magazine's frequency of issue—and some sixteeen hours each day, any one of which he may select for the reading. If he wishes, or is forced by circumstances, he may allow two or more installments to accumulate unread, and then digest them at a single sitting. And finally, he may save all the copies containing the serial until it is completed, and then read the whole story without interruption.

None of these methods is possible with the serial motion pictures. Each installment appears at certain theaters on certain definite days—generally in the evening only. If an installment is released every week, or every two weeks, the "reader" must not only wait that period, but must be on hand at the proper time or he misses the installment. Except within extremely narrow limits, he cannot select his own time to see any part of it; he cannot see but one installment at a time; and he cannot by any possibility let the installments accumulate and view them all in one day or evening.

So the serial motion picture is handicapped; for many people cannot or will not "tie themselves up" to a series of definite dates, missing any one of which would kill the value of those preceding and succeeding it.

Several attempts have been made by ingenious exhibitors to get around this difficulty. For example, several exhibitors have tried showing a serial film in the installments corresponding with its regular release dates, and later when the series is finished, repeating the whole story in daily instead of weekly or bi-weekly installments. By so doing the spectator is given two chances to see each installment, and consequently a choice between two different ways of seeing the whole story.

Some of the popular magazines are in the habit of running stories which are virtually serials made up of a number of short stories, each complete in itself and quite satisfactory to the reader whether he reads only one, or all, or the last one first. Yet these stories, taken together and considered as a serial, constitute a connected series of adventures or episodes in the lives of their characters. An example of this kind of writing which occurs to us now (probably suggested by the European war) is the Blue Book's "Adventures of a Diplomatic Free Lance," by Clarence Herbert New. Our readers will doubtless recall many other and even better examples of this type of story. It has had its counterparts in motion pictures, although it differs from the kind of motion picture series—not serial—which features a succession of adventures of a certain character or characters, but whose separate releases have no connection and do not make a continuous story.

The serial story or scenario whose each installment is complete and perfect by itself is really no more difficult to write than the ordinary form of connected serial. It has all the advantages of the connected serial; for the familiar installment ending which leaves the observer "up in the air" by breaking off at a critical point in the story is not so popular in a theater as it is in a magazine, and sometimes engenders actual ill-feeling. It has in addition the advantage of holding the irregular patronage by the independence of its installments and the consequent independence of the theater patron.

Serial pictures have had considerable measure of success so far, but it has been largely by dint of vigorous campaigns of newspaper advertising, which may not always be secured on such advantageous terms. If there is any further development of the serial film, it may well make better progress along the lines we have explained—the series-serial, whose installments are complete stories, each interesting enough to carry the observer on the next one, yet not giving him the feeling that he is being forced to come back.

PICTURES WHICH SHOW MONEY.

THREE weeks ago MOTOGRAPHY published, under the caption "Weird Stunts of Our Censor Board," a compilation showing the films that had been objected to or cut out by the Chicago censors during a half-month period. In this list of one hundred twelve examples of censorious activity were the following rather curious cut-out items:

Scene showing $1 bill.
All scenes in counterfeiters' den showing money.
Showing stamped envelope.
Both scenes showing stamped envelope.

And so forth; the idea being that any pictures of money or stamps are unlawful and that it is the duty of the police to assist the government in the detection and prevention of such infringements.

Of course, it is common knowledge that drawing, engraving, or photographing money, or other government tokens, so as to obtain a virtual copy of it, is illegal, as it is, in effect, counterfeiting. Now it is quite evident that a motion picture scene containing a view of a dollar bill or postage stamp has no sinister significance, and could by no possibility be used to the confusion of our government or its officials. But federal laws are always enforced to the letter and not merely to the spirit. A motion picture is a picture, and so comes under the ban. A few days ago a four-reel feature film by one of the leading producers was confiscated by secret service men, not because it showed counterfeiting scenes, but because it showed money—real or imitation—in those scenes.

Our laws should always be obeyed; but such literal enforcement as this is quite apt to be unjust. It is interesting, therefore, to get the report that Judge William Fowler of the Superior Court at San Francisco, Cal., has made a ruling in a similar case which seems to promise relief. The case was that of the People vs. Keanograph Film Manufacturing Company, and concerned a six-reel feature film showing United States money. After seeing the picture the court ruled that the reproduction in this instance was not contrary to law, thus overruling the contentions of the federal authorities.

This is merely a case where interpretation of an existing law was needed to show how strictly the letter of the law need be enforced. It is reasonable to presume that the federal authorities will be satisfied with the ruling and will henceforth allow a judicious use of currency in motion picture scenes.

Just A Moment Please

Yep, we're back!

We never imagined for a moment, though, that the minute we got off the lid, Czar Nick, Kaiser Bill, Kink Geo. and the rest of the boys would cut loose, but it only goes to show that they need watching all the time.

Hereafter we shan't advertise the fact ahead of time that we're going to take a week off—then perhaps we'll be back before somebody can start something.

Sherman, we believe, is the chap that said "War is Hell," but we discovered that being afloat on the middle of one of the great lakes, with nothing but meager wireless war bulletins to entertain us, comes pretty close to it. We'd go ashore only to discover that the only newspapers obtainable were those of day before yesterday, or the day before that, so it'll take us till about next Thursday to catch up with the events of the day.

THEIR FAVORITE FILMS.

Czar Nick—"Victory."
Kaiser Bill—"War."
King George—"All at Sea."
Mary Fuller—"Money Talks."
L. P. Bonvillian—"A Change of Business."

The Pathe publicity man bulletins us that several of the vice-presidents and a good many of the employes of his company have returned to France to answer the call to arms. One in particular is mentioned as being a sous-lieutenant in the French army. Don't understand French, but that "sous-lieutenant" sounds suspicious. We could nominate several fellers for captains, corporals or sergeants in the same regiment if it's what we think it is.

Personal—L. R.—Have no fear. Paul Haase is in no danger of being "jugged" with your card in his pocket as incriminating evidence. He knows all the coppers in Chi. and is immune from arrest for anything short of manslaughter.

Two full weeks—perfectly sober ones at that—have passed and not a word has yet been received from Col. Nutt, our war correspondent. When last heard from the colonel was headed for the war zone amply equipped with frankfurters, sauer kraut, lead pencils, smoking tobacco and a recent edition of that valuable treatise, "How to Behave on the Battlefield." Will anybody who meets the colonel kindly inform him that his first reports from the field of conflict are eagerly awaited?

"Bunch of robbers, these exhibitors—charge a dime on Sundays an' only a nickel week days."

"Wish I was Mr. Kalem; I could sit an' look at pictures all day for nothing."

"I hate these scenery pictures."

"Yes, she's pretty, but they say she drinks like a fish."

"Sure, Frank Bushman is married to Ruth Stonehouse. Claude told me so, and Claude knows all these theatrical folks."

"Wonder what time it is?"

The latest issue of the Eclair Bulletin shows a "pic" of "Cremo hanging one thousand feet in the air." Good heavins, we thought Cremo was a cigar, not a hero, though we'll frankly admit that men who could smoke 'em were heroes.

OUR BURG.

Much excitement exists on Randolph street over the disappearance of our fellow townsman, Col. Selig, somewhere in the interior of war-ridden Europe.

Geo. Cox, one of our prom. cits., is back from the Mexican border with some great yarns of his experiences and gobs of new film.

E. H. Brient and Paul Bush of the Peerless F. F. Co. wuz seen boarding the rattler for the Effete East one day last week. E. H. is getting to be a regular commuter.

Young Man Goes on Strange Errand

Clever Mystery Story

"SEVEN Sealed Orders," the release of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, for Friday, August 28 is the style of mystery story that works out along the lines of the majority of short stories and novels of this type, keeping the spectator blind-folded as to "what's what" until the final scene.

A subject of this kind is exceedingly difficult to handle in a manner which will be clear to the average patron of the picture houses but the Essanay players and director have succeeded in clearing up the many complications and the final fade out should find no one in doubt. The plot of the production, which was adapted from the Munsey magazines, is so far out of the ordinary that it is certain to prove a treat to the "fans." The photography is clear throughout and, working hand in hand with the well arranged scenario, the effect is attractive and at no time does the picture become indistinct in any way.

Keene is watched by the hotel clerk.

The cast is headed by Richard C. Travers, who does excellent work as an adventurous young man who goes on what his partner thinks is a "fool's errand" but which is very profitable to him. Thomas Commerford, Rapley Holmes and M. C. Von Betz give Mr. Travers splendid support while a number of minor players are used to good advantage. There are no women in the production.

There are several interior sets used and all are well set and carefully arranged in regard to detail and atmosphere. The exterior backgrounds are also well chosen.

The picture begins by showing the seven sealed orders with their instructions typewritten on the outside of each envelope. Then we learn that Joseph Keene, the junior member of a business firm, has received them in his morning mail, together with $20,000. As the instructions on the first envelope tells Keene to read the contents he does and is directed to go to the 12th street station at once. His partner ridicules the idea but as Keene is of an adventurous nature he determines to follow the affair to the end.

He goes to the 12th street station as directed and upon arriving there opens the second order which directs him to take the next train to Scarburg, Ill. Again he complies with the directions and upon landing in the town opens the next order which tells him to go to the Central Hotel and rent the room on the south side of the building.

This last order is not easily complied with, however, for Moss, whose sister owns the hotel refuses to give Keene the key to the room he wishes but offers him any of the other rooms. Keene refuses and leaves the hotel, disgusted with what he believes is the end of the adventure. He then thinks of his orders and upon opening the next one learns that if he is unable to secure the room he wishes he is to buy the hotel. At once he goes to a real estate dealer and with the $20,000 which he received with the orders he purchases the hotel, much to the chagrin of Moss and his pal Regan. Keene also meets an old friend who is president of the bank in the town.

Moss and Regan get together and in an excited manner discuss an old tradition connected with the hotel. They decide there must be something to it and when they learn that Keene is trying to purchase the lots on the east, west and south sides of the one he already has secured they hurriedly buy the one on the south, Keene getting the other two.

Through the treachery of the hotel clerk, whom they bribe, the plotting pair learn of the sealed orders which Keene is working under and decide that their hopes of getting inside information as to the secret of the hotel lies in securing the orders. They hire three thugs, who catch Keene on a deserted street and take his purse. When they deliver the stolen object to Moss and Regan, however, all are puzzled to find it empty. Keene has concealed the orders in another pocket.

The adventurer receives a message saying that "animated" is the word and this puzzles him more than ever. He opens his sixth order and this tells him to place the seventh letter in the bank unless it becomes necessary for him to open it in order to solve the mystery. He goes to his friend the banker and has the letter placed in a vault and engages two detectives to watch the room in the hotel.

The next day Keene learns that the seventh order has been stolen and at once the search is started. The plotters in their office plan to tunnel into the hotel from their lot next door. A Hindoo arrives in town and goes to the hotel. By clever planning Regan manages to have Keene arrested for fighting with one of his co-workers and then telephones the police not to release him on bail as he is wanted in another city.

One of the conspirators has a quarrel with the ringleaders and is told that he will not share in the booty. Angered, he goes to the banker and tells him of the manner in which the seventh order was stolen. The banker arranges for Keene's release and together they go to the hotel where they meet the Hindoo who mentions the word "animated" to Keene. The young man knows that he must be connected with the case in some way but the other warns him to be quiet. All go to the room in which the detectives are keeping watch.

Just as they arrive there the sound of digging is heard in the basement and the party hurries downstairs just as Moss and Regan complete their tunnel and break into the hotel. They are placed under arrest and the Hindoo then steps to the wall and opens a secret vault from which he takes a jewel of great value. All return to the main floor of the hotel and after the crooks have been started on their way to prison the Hindoo gives Keene more money and explains the mystery to him by saying that, many years before, Moss' brother had stolen the jewel from an Indian temple and had died without telling its hiding place. It had always been a sort of tradition, however, that the hotel contained hidden treasure and the Rajah, for the Hindoo proved to be a man of high standing in India, had decided to learn the truth of the matter. Keene is satisfied with the adventure and considerably richer than when he started.

Aitken Optimistic About War

The motion picture business, industry and art, faces the greatest year in its profitable history as the direct result of the serious war situation in Europe, according to statements made by Harry E. Aitken, president of the Mutual Film Corporation, in an interview recently.

"This most unexpected and deplorable war, which will cost Europe millions in treasure and in men, if the present conditions are not suddenly and unexpectedly helped, is bound to bring about a general prosperity for the United States," said Mr. Aitken, "I believe that as soon as the trade conditions are adjusted we will see the most prosperous business this country has ever seen.

"The direct effect on the motion picture business is to cut off exporting and importing, and as soon as conditions are adjusted the increase in domestic business will more than take care of any export loss, and with importation cut off American films will be in great demand.

"There is another element, the effect of which is already being felt. In times of excitement people are brought out from their homes. The motion picture houses benefit immediately from this condition, because of its small cost to the public."

As a result of a general shake-up at the Lubin eastern studios in Philadelphia only four companies remain, these being under the direction of Barry O'Neal, Arthur Johnson, Joseph Smiley and George W. Terwillinger.

Latest Lasky Release Sets New Record

Robert Edeson Featured

A TRIUMPH in artistry is the new Lasky film—"The Call of the North," in which Robert Edeson, the star of years of big productions on the legitimate stage, makes his first screen appearance, and does so to the plaudits of a public that has long known and honored him.

The Strand theater offered an appropriate setting and musical accompaniment for the premier showing of this film of the northland, and the past week's attendance at that Broadway picture palace spoke for the popularity of the film and its star.

The subject offers especial opportunity to the cast and each member responds in a manner that brings individual credit to each. Robert Edeson's portrayal of the trader of the Hudson Bay post, and later as a free trader and one to whom the call of the great and vast North is a compelling lure, is one that completely satisfies.

The atmosphere of the North imbues the film throughout, and owes its vividness to the natural settings chosen as the story's background. It is these settings which give the film its high artistic value and which in themselves constitute a distinctive attraction. To Wilfred Buckland scenic artist for the Lasky Feature Play Company, and Stuart Edward White, author of the book, "Conjuror's House," from which the play, "Call of the North," was taken, thanks are due for the choice of these settings. Cecel B. DeMille, director general, and Oscar Apfel are responsible for the film's finished direction, while the photography is one of the essentials that go to make "The Call of the North" the unmistakably fine feature offering that it is.

There is a prologue in which Galen Albert, the factor of an important trading post in the great Northwest, bids Graehme Stewart (Robert Edeson) good-bye. and sets off on a journey to another post. He loses his

He is given food and shelter and his tales of his czardom in his part of the country fascinate her until she consents to marry him. Rand, who had hoped to marry Elodie, though she had refused him, followed, vowing vengeance, and obtained work with the factor.

Stewart's motherless son becomes a favorite with Elodie and she spends much time playing with him. At Christmas she makes a beaded pouch for her father and sends it by Rand. The pouch contains the card, "With love from Elodie," and Rand places it in the home of Stewart instead of giving it to Elodie's father. Summoning the factor, he shows him the pouch and card on Stewart's table.

The factor calls Stewart and, giving him the pouch to hang about his neck, sends him on "the journey of death." This means being sent into the great forests with no gun and no food.

On the fifth day the factor's watchful Indian, Me-engan, removes the pouch from the throat of the dead Stewart and returns to the factor. Stewart's young son is sent away to civilization and he carries around his neck the pouch that had been the innocent cause of his father's death.

The story jumps to twenty years later and shows the factor's daughter, Virginia, for whom Elodie has given her life, now a young woman and the pride of the factor, to whom the years have given new dignity and power.

A young man, a free trader (Robert Edeson), is relieved of his spoils and ordered to leave the country. Before he complies he meets a former friend of his father's, who tells him how the latter met his death. Back in his home in civilization, the son, known as Ned Grant, hears the call of the North and answers it, with the thought of avenging his father's death, if possible. McTavish, also a lord of the Northland, en route to visit the factor, makes Ned captive, and because the latter is a free trader the factor condemns him to take the journey of death.

Virginia has fallen in love with Ned and brings him a gun and food, but these are found and Virginia confesses her act. After a hearing before the factor, Ned is sent out on the journey without them.

Rand, who had caused Stewart's death, is shot by a girl he had tried to induce to marry him and dying, confesses to having lied to the factor about Stewart and the factor's wife. Summoning his Indians, the factor

Famous Players Engage Blanche Walsh

The Famous Players Film Company has engaged Blanche Walsh to be presented in a forthcoming release in her foremost dramatic triumph, "The Straight Road," one of the most popular plays from the pen of the great dramatist, Clyde Fitch.

The character of Mary O'Hara, the girl of the slums, so wonderfully impersonated by Miss Walsh in the original stage production, will be played by her in the Famous Players film dramatization of the subject.

Coast Companies Involved in Suit

The Motion Picture Patent Company of New York has brought suit against five producing concerns in Los Angeles for illegally using cameras patented by it. The Oz Film Manufacturing Company, the Albuquerque Film Manufacturing Company, the St. Louis Moving Picture Company, the Nash Moving Picture Company and the Boswick Company, Inc., are named as defendants in the suit.

Child Actress Unable to Leave Europe

Mimi Yvonne, the child actress of "The Littlest Rebel" is reported to be in danger in the city of Leipsic. After completing her work in this production, she sailed for Europe with her mother where she was to have been placed in a convent for two years. When war was declared she decided to return to America, but was unable to cash the traveller checques she had in her possession. The American consul was notified by the Photo Play Productions Company and a return message stated that she would be sent to America within a few days.

Many Clowns Sign With Horsley

Jimmie Hyland, the funny man with Berzac's pony and unrideable mule (Maud) act and George Zammett, late of the famous dollar troupe of Risley acrobats—one of the oldest clowns in the circus world, Harry La Pearl, "Spook" Hanson and twenty other crack clowns, picked from the Sells-Floto and Wirth Brothers' Australian shows who have recently been appearing at the New York Hippodrome, go to work with the troupe which, under the direction of Tommie Mullens, will make one of the series of seven one reel comedies a week soon to be released by the Centaur Film Company.

One On the Editor

Recently F. A. Wall, scenario editor of the American Film Manufacturing Company received the following letter: "My dear Mr. Wall: Received your letter and also copy of the sample scenario and after reading the scenario over, have come to the conclusion that if I could not write a better scenario than that I would work for a living."

Miss Black his assistant, asked what scenario he sent. The editor, laughing, replied: "Therein lies the joke: I sent her a copy of one of my own scenarios."

The assistant editor joined in the laughter when she learned that Mr. Wall had sent the young lady a copy of "The Dream Child" produced by Mr. Ricketts.

Camera Men in War Zone

A cablegram received from the Universal London offices by Jack Cohn, manager of the Animated Weekly, states that eight cameramen have just been dispatched into the European war zone armed with passports, letters of introduction and what not. These men will take special scenes to be incorporated into the Animated Weekly. Many of the men who are engaged in this work are veterans, having served time with the camera in the Balkan war.

"Vendetta" Through General Film Co.

It has been definitely decided that the five-reel Kleine subject, "Vendetta" will be released through the General Film Company, Special Feature Department, September 1. Advance reports claim that "Vendetta" is headed for a tremendous success in America. Aside from Marie Corelli's sensational story, the settings are the most beautiful that could be found in Southern Italy, the photography superfine, and the acting sensational in the extreme.

The two-million-dollar Selig studio is rapidly developing at Los Angeles. The cement driveways now are completed, while the landscaping at and about the art animal cages is in the hands of a competent staff of gardeners. A new cookhouse and restaurant have been completed near the mission dressing rooms.

Sans Grease Paint and Wig

By Mabel Condon

Pearl White.

IF it hadn't been for her thumb-ring, Pearl White would have had the afternoon off and probably a drive in a hansom-cab in Central Park. Though the last occasion on which she hansomed in Central Park, she was thrown out on her face and bruised it and her arms, and tore a gown that she had never worn before and certainly would never be able to wear again.

"Never," I marveled when Miss White described to me the happening on that almost-off day in her partly-dismantled dressing room (partly dismantled because its use is seldom, as not many of the "Perils of Pauline" pictures are made near the Pathe studio). "Never," I expressed my wonder, "have I seen a hansom-cab horse that might be guilty of so energetic an act!"

"Well," Miss White explained, "this horse tripped at the top of a hill and when he fell, I was thrown out." So after all, it seems, the horse had been innocent of any ambition to depart from the pace traveled only by hansom-cab horses.

"But that's the way," went on Miss White flurishing the hand that wore the thumb-ring. "I take risks, big risks, every day of my life, being the perilous Pauline. But the minute I'm out of danger and attempt to do so gentle a thing as take myself a ride in a hansom-cab, I hurt my bones and shed real blood. See that mark, and that one, and the one on this other arm?" I saw. "Well," they're just a few of the ones that are left. I have several on my knees."

For no reason at all, I'll remark right here that Miss White is from Missouri; Sedalia was the town and doubtless there are many people there who remember her, as White is her real name.

"And I'm not even mentioning my ruined gown!" Miss White was saying.

"Certainly not!" I obliged. "I merely guessed that you had one on and that it got torn."

"It was nothing," generously conceded Miss White, and continued: "It was Sunday afternoon and I was taking myself a ride in a hansom-cab; I was minding my own business — my own business — and I was feeling nice because it was Sunday afternoon and I knew my new hat to be becoming. And look what happened!"

"Immediately I stop risking my life and act like an ordinary human being, I'm tossed on my face and attract a crowd!" Miss White's clear, decisive and pleasing voice was indignant; Miss White's red-brown-green eyes were not. One might almost have suspected Miss White of enjoying the remembrance of her tumble from the hansom-cab.

"But that's the way, as I said before; I can do the most daring things and not get a scratch, but the minute I try something easy I nearly lose my life. That's a funny kind of a jinx to have, isn't it?"

"Most unusual," I replied.

"In the 'Perils of Pauline,'" resumed she of the Perils, "the most risky things I've had to do have been the most successful. But do you remember that picture where I was being carried up the stairs with my hands bound? That picture should have been the most harmless of any. Yet, when the man who was carrying me got as far as the seventh step —only the seventh!—he stubbed his toe and I was thrown to the floor on my head. As my arms were tied, I couldn't break the fall so my head and spine got the full force of it. I couldn't do a thing for weeks afterward. And had the fall been from the top of the stairs it wouldn't have seemed so bad—but only the seventh step!

"Then another instance of my 'small time' jinx happened in the Chinese picture when Owen and the Chinamen hid me in a secret room of the Chinese restaurant. The door through which they took me was a low one and the Chinaman carrying me neglected to lower me sufficiently, when we were going through, and it nearly took the top of my head right off.

"But anything as really dangerous as that runaway balloon—and it was the most dangerous peril of any, so far—or being chased down the hill by a big boulder, or coming down from Execution lighthouse in a breeches-buoy—and that was not at all easy though it looked to be—all these were safe ventures compared to the risk I'd run if I attempted to walk around the block."

Miss White sighed, knocked wood and turned her thumb-ring around twice.

"Did you know," I asked—and I wonder how many people have wondered the same thing—"Did you know what you would be called upon to do when you undertook to be 'Pauline'?"

"No, entirely and absolutely 'No.' I knew there was to be a series of pictures and I realized the series would be a big thing. I said to the three men representing the Pathe company—

"Why did you choose me?' And they replied—the three of them—'Because the part calls for an Actress!'

"Of course, that settled it! My life's ambition has been to be called a real actress—and these three men told me I was it; so immediately I signed. And," she added, "there hasn't been a chance for acting yet. What those three men meant was Athlete, not actress! Well, I am an athlete so it seems I'm in the right place after all. But to be told I was an Actress!"

The red-brown-green eyes sought the ceiling, rather their glance did, and the White hands found each other in an ecstatic clasp, the thumb-ring on top and showing to advantage.

"Comedy or drama?" I asked half-expecting that because Miss White is talented as a comedien her ambitions would wander drama-ward.

"Comedy," she answered as the thumb-ring was lost to sight among the folds of her dress. "I did comedy for the Powers company, which was the one I started in; I was there about a year, then came to the Pathe company and stayed a year. The Crystal company was formed and I was invited to play leads so I went. I was there for a year and a half, though six months of this time, really, was a vacation-trip through Europe.

"I spent months of that time in Italy. Wonderful Italy! Vive Italia! I am an Italian, you know!" I had known but had forgotten.

"Yes, my mother was from Italy and my father was from Ireland. But I feel Italian and sometime I intend to live in Italy. I would like to be over there now; it would be thrilling, with the war on!"

"It would be a 'Peril,' no doubt of that," I agreed and she replied she'd like nothing better than to go over and make pictures on the border. The border! There must be millions of borders over there.

"Of course—" Miss White turned the thumb-ring first one direction then the other. What she then said had nothing to do with the "Of course."

"This ring was given to me by an Italian nobleman. It's a crest ring and an heirloom. There's a crown sunken in the center of the blood-stone—See? That's my birth-stone. March fourth was the date and the last one made my twenty-five. And almost fifteen of those years have been theatrical. I started as 'Little Eva' when I was five, was in a circus doing trapeze stunts for two years, and went to school only about every other year and that in various cities. My last engagement before pictures, was at the Casino at Asbury Park. But the salt water affected my voice and I had to do something to rest it, so I turned to pictures."

"And what after the 'Perils'?" I asked and she told me.

"Big time vaudeville. I have a splendid offer and I think the publicity Pauline's perils have brought me will make it worth while. After that, I undoubtedly will go into pictures again. Meanwhile, I'm buying a farm; my father's going to run it for me and when I want a real rest, I'll go up there just any time. It's in upper New York state. But there are going to be twenty-six releases of the 'Perils of Pauline' instead of thirteen as was originally planned, so there are many adventures before me yet.

"I think," Pearl White decided as we went up and then down two long halls that eventually led us out to the door and the lawn, "I think that I'll miss the exciting adventures of 'Pauline' when the series is completed though really, doing them isn't any fun!"

The girl who impersonates the daring Pauline is one whose face is wonderously pretty, whose hair is a wonderful red and whose manner is wonderfully frank; so frank that nobody could have a doubt as to her always meaning exactly what she said and always saying exactly what she means.

"There," said Miss White indicating a chair, a newspaper and a tripod which decorated the lawn in front of the studio. "There is the setting for the one 'close-up' I had to do today. I simply have to sit down and hold that newspaper in front of my face. And nobody else could have been substituted because my thumb-ring is a part of the 'close-up.'"

So that's the explanation of why the thumb-ring was responsible for the day that should have been "off," but wasn't.

Viewing the "Pics"

Censorship day at the Essanay studio means not a crowd, but the assemblage of a select few. Just how select you have reason to know.

Remember that first day you tore madly down Dearborn street, not caring who bumped who, and arrived at room 521 all out of breath but feeling pleased that you made it at nine-thirty? And who greeted you? Nobody. But you greeted a calm-looking man with the remark that you came to see pictures. The calm-looking man continued to remain so. You changed to the other foot, asked if this wasn't Essanay's, and the calm individual enunciated "Yes" quite clearly, while you repeated the object of your mission—remember?

When you had swallowed twice and had indelibly imprinted the features of G. M. Anderson, which gazed at you from the wall, upon your mind, you tried to again tell the mountain of calmness why you were there; but you had lost your voice. Finally, the calm gentleman requested to know who had sent you and you managed to put the blame on the goat man, the editor and the advertising man, not to mention your detailed account of the day—before visit of V. R. Day and his suggestion that you view the "pics" the next day in company with the censorship board.

Then, but not until then, were you waved to a seat on the side-lines to await the tardy arrival of the "board" and the picture machine operator. A tall, young lady with pretty, dark hair and eyes arrived and everybody—the stenographer and the calm gentleman—duoed "Good-morning, Miss Kauffman." Miss Kauffman returned a sweet "Good-morning" and addressed the calm person as Mr. Lynch. Then she made herself at home at the big desk in the middle of the outer office and you picked up a newspaper which, after ten minutes of perusal, you noticed bore the date of the day before.

Mr. Lynch signaled you that all was ready, donned a hat as proof against hall draughts, and showed you the way to the little blue theater on the fourth floor. En route, he informed you that he had been away for several weeks and that was why he didn't know you. You knew the "why" was that you had never been to the Essanay office before, but wisely kept the knowledge to yourself, took your choice of the theater's ninety-eight seats and concluded that the "board" was the big man to whom Mr. Lynch presented the fat, black cigar. Miss Kauffman swelled the attendance to four, and the operator began the pictures.

At the end of the fifth reel all four of you had aired your views as regards scenery, players and photography; Mr. Lynch had forgotten his calmness and you had done likewise. And when you buttoned your coat and were ready to depart, Mr. Lynch told you to come again and he'd show you some more good ones—remember?

Meanwhile, the "board" makes notes on the paper with the film titles on, which is given him by Mr. Lynch, the while he blows smoke-rings and enjoys the films. 'Tis a gay life and a pleasant one, that of the "board," and you register the wish, on successive Fridays, that it were yours. Between Fridays, you never think about it.

So you realize now, don't you, how perfectly select, the Friday assemblage at nine-thirty is? And if anybody should ask you how you happen to get in on censorship day, refer him to Mr. Lynch.

Plan to Extend Censorship Work

Binder Offers Suggestion

J. W. Binder

TO extend the splendid work of the National Board of Censorship to fifty centers throughout the United States through local unsalaried committees working in harmony with it; to reach one hundred per cent efficiency in censoring films; to adopt a new signed and copyrighted stamp, the unauthorized use of which is forgery; to popularize this stamp through an advertising and publicity campaign; through this campaign to combat legalized censorship of any and all kinds, and to secure broader financial support is the program undertaken for the National Board of Censorship of Motion Pictures by J. W. Binder who is well known in the trade as a student of the art from the standpoint of a specialist in organization.

Mr. Binder when seen at the office of the National Board, No. 70 Fifth avenue, New York City, said:

"Two things menace the solid growth of the motion picture. They are, in the order of their importance, legalized censorship whether federal, state or municipal; and, second, bad pictures. I mean bad from a moral, not artistic, standpoint. To be sure, fundamentally, the two are one. If there were no bad pictures, put out by irresponsible producers, the clamor raised by politicians and reformers for legalized censorship would have no point. It would be futile.

"My study of the work of the National Board shows that, while its members are human and liable to err in their judgments, yet, the number of pictures the Board has passed about which there was any question at all, is so small a percentage of the whole number passed upon, as to be entirely negligible. It is from the small number of pictures which are not submitted to the Board (their makers well knowing that they would be condemned) that 99% of the criticism comes which is eagerly seized upon by the politicians as an excuse for the creation of a local legalized censor board with its desirable concomitants of fat fees, and other indirect "emoluments" and possibilities. If this small number of pictures could be brought under the jurisdiction of the National Board and either condemned or remade until fit to be shown, there is no doubt but that local censorship would die a natural death in a very little while.

"To bring about this very desirable end is the prime object of the campaign which I have undertaken for the National Board. In working it out, no untried "theories" will be used. Every step has been proven by actually organizing similar committees in widely separated centers throughout the United States. These committees have been organized for from one month to one and a half years and it is safe to use the results obtained as fair examples of what can be achieved by this plan when it shall have been extended to cover the United States.

"In Milwaukee about a year ago there was created a local body recruited from the membership of the City Club and Chamber of Commerce, with representation from the motion picture exhibitors, and civic and religious societies. This committee, serving without pay, receives the weekly bulletin of the National Board and almost without exception accepts the films the Board has passed without question. In case of complaint, however, the film is at once investigated. The committee, however, concentrates its efforts upon the films advertised to appear in the local houses which have not been passed by the National Board. If any of these are objectionable the theater owner or the producer is called before the Board and the film is either ordered off or it is changed so as to come up to the well established standards of the National Board which have been adopted as the standards of the local committee. This committee is appointed by the mayor and its work has the hearty endorsement and co-operation of the University of Wisconsin.

"So satisfactory has been the plan to all concerned that there has been no agitation for legalized censorship anywhere in the state of Wisconsin. Like committees have been organized in New York, Kansas City, Nashville, Portland, Omaha, Los Angeles, and in Fort Worth and Houston, Texas. In neither of these cities is there any agitation for local legalized censorship. So the plan works. And if it works in these places is it unreasonable to predict that it will be just as efficient in any one of the other cities throughout the United States?

"To bring this about under the direction of the National Board and to provide funds for doing it, is therefore one of the prime objects of the campaign.

"The second thing which we shall aim to do, is to provide a fund for carrying on a campaign of publicity, through the media of the trade press, the magazines and the 23,000 newspapers of the United States, exposing the fallacies of legalized censorship; giving illustrations of the injustice it inflicts on the producer, distributor and exhibitor of motion pictures; showing its cost to the public which must in the end bear the increased cost of marketing films. At the same time the splendidly conducted work of the National Board will be shown and the merits of its constructive criticism compared with that of the so-called legal censor who is not permitted to say what should be done if he were able to do so; but must confine himself to saying what must not be done and what must not be shown.

"A distinct feature of this publicity campaign will be to teach the millions who see the new signed stamp of the Board, on the screen, what that insignia on a film stands for. They will be told what precedes its emplacement on any film and who the men and women are who determine whether this hallmark of excellence shall or shall not be given a particular picture. The public, through this campaign will be taught that when they see this stamp on a film, they are guaranteed a picture made by a reputable manufacturer and that it contains nothing that should be offensive to any liberal minded person, the Board at all times striving in its criticism to hold the viewpoint of the average spectator. The value of such a campaign to the manufacturers, distributors and exhibitors is incalculable.

"Of course to do these things, and at the same time continue to conduct the National Board as in the past will require raising some money. Just how much must be raised, I cannot at this time say. My plans, however, contemplate increasing the revenue of the Board from $14,000 per year (principally contributed by three groups of manufacturers) to at least $25,000, which I propose to secure by pledges of monthly sums from everybody connected with the industry—manufacturer, distributor, exhibitor or supply men. Everybody in any way connected with the industry is vitally interested in the defeat of legalized censorship for upon this depends the continuity and prosperity of the art. This plan will do it and at the same time conserve the interests of the fair-minded public. Therefore it deserves to be and will be supported by everybody who is interested in seeing the motion picture industry continue to grow.

"I shall have no compunction in asking for these subscriptions. I am convinced that I am doing the man asked the biggest favor imaginable in pointing a 'way out' of the impossible condition that would obtain under the exactions of legalized censorship.

"If the expense is distributed fairly and equitably in this way, the amount that will have to be paid by each will be inconsiderable when compared with the benefits to the trade that will accrue."

Was Caught Smoking

"Tommy" Harper, Essanay's little 12-year-old actor, was sitting out back of the studio the other day, peacefully enjoying his first cigar, when his father appeared upon the scene. Tommy, in his efforts to conceal the lighted cigar, stuck it in his pocket. It soon began to cause a great disturbance and Tommy was obliged to pull the "rope" out in front of father. A little later the youngster said he didn't feel very well, so went home, where, it was learned, he had a pressing engagement with his father in the woodshed.

"Shore Acres" To be Next

Headed by John H. Pratt, the new All Star director and former leading man and director for the Reliance Company, who has been for the past six months allied with the All Star Feature Film Corporation in the capacity of master of studios and assistant to Augustus Thomas, the All Star players, numbering twenty-seven, left the early part of this week for the shores of Maine to begin the production of James A. Herne's immortal drama of down East folks, which for so many years has thrilled theater goers of this country, and, in fact, the world.

Most elaborate preparations are being made by the All Star Company towards making "Shore Acres" a monument to the name of James A. Herne, and with this end in view there has already been expended an amount figuring well up into thousands for special studio equipment and the building of material for effects that the various opportunities offered by "Shore Acres" may be most vividly and correctly shown on the screen.

Mr. Pratt, for the past few weeks, has been cooperating with Louis Reeves Harrison, the writer of the scenario, and together they have decided upon several effects which are bound to stamp the coming production as one of the leaders of the season.

"Shore Acres" is planned by the All Star Feature Corporation as the next release following Ethel Barrymore in "The Nightingale."

Lauds Motion Pictures

Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton of Chicago, national leader of women's affairs, is a strong advocate of motion pictures. In a recent address before the National Kindergarten Convention, Mrs. Britton said:

"The influence of the motion picture show is good beyond question. Critics have said that poor people spent more than they should on this amusement, but on the other hand, the pictures have done more than anything else to unify family life among the people, for they have kept the family together in their recreation, where they might otherwise have been miserably separated. Especially are the motion picture theaters in the outlying neighborhoods a good influence for the public. So far as I have seen, all of the photoplays are clean and perfectly fit for any child to see."

"The Futility of Revenge"

Aside from the stirring melodrama Frank Crane is putting into the Imp features he is producing, one, as a rule, finds a lasting moral in them. Mr. Crane, while declaring that his primary aim is to interest and amuse from the dramatic standpoint, believes on the other hand that pictures should attain some good end.

In "The Futility of Revenge," which he now has under production, we have a strong drama depending on unusual complications and situations. With an enlarged cast, headed by Alexander Gaden and Dorothy Phillips, the play will stand, Mr. Crane declares, as the best Imp feature he has produced up to date. Again there is a tremendous moral coupled with pathos in the story.

Films Realistic Fall

In one of Essanay's pictures, "Sunbonnet Strings," which is to be released in the near future, Ruth Stonehouse was to jump from a cliff, and Richard Travers was to catch her in his arms. Ruth jumped but she came down much faster than Travers calculated, and as a result they both went tumbling down the hill. She struck Travers' bruised shoulder, which he received in an automobile accident recently, and he was unable to withstand the weight. The camera man kept on grinding when he saw the pair rolling down the hill, so has a rare piece of negative. Ruth was buried in gravel up to her waist when she finally stopped rolling, and Travers kept on going until he was almost in the lake. They both escaped without serious injury.

Alfred Tennyson's popular poem "Break, Break, Break" is being made into pictures by the "Flying A" Company under direction of Sydney Ayres.

Warner's Features Releasing Odd Films

Battle Picture Interesting

ON August 24 the B. & C. company will release through Warner's Features its three reel drama, "The Battle for Life." The plot is laid in a sea coast town in England and the action takes place about the year 1803, when the English fleet was actively engaged in battle. One of the incidents of the picture is the death of the renowned Nelson, after one of the marksmen seated on the cross-trees of the enemy's ship has picked him for a victim.

There is much in the picture to create and sustain an audience's interest. Plays depicting English naval life and especially of this historic period are so rare as to be a novelty, and this one in particular contains a rollicking, romantic spirit that attracts instantly. A strong point in its favor is the fevered suspense excited by the girl's heroic attempt to rescue her sweetheart from death at the end of the yard-arm, which she finally does by a bare margin of seconds.

The make-up of the characters is the quaint, old-fashioned mode of dress typical of our New England states over a hundred years ago. The sailors wear odd-looking black hats, pigtails, breeches, stockings, and low-cut shoes. The houses and street scenes are typically English and have many duplicates in and about Boston and other Northern sea coast towns. The acting is free and natural and the photography and direction well handled.

Silas Hatchet is jealous of William Curtis, the favored lover of Susan, and plans to get rid of him. His scheme is successful, and William is seized by the press gang and taken to sea. A couple of years later he returns, but his joy over being with Susan is short-lived, for his visit is interrupted by orders to return to duty.

Just before leaving, an officer insults Susan and William strikes him. For that crime he is sentenced to be hung at the yard-arm. In the meantime William's application for release from service has been granted and the papers sent through the mail. Hatchet and an accomplice rob the carrier and secure William's release, but are soon afterward deprived of it by Susan who rushes to save her sweetheart.

They pursue her and she is forced to swim about half way out to the boat. She arrives just as the noose is being placed over William's head. By the date of the papers it is proven that William was not in the King's service when the blow was struck and therefore is guilty of no crime.

The man-o'-warsman is condemned to death in "The Battling British."

"THE Last Battle" is produced in three reels by the Milano people and released through Warner's Features. The interior scenes are good in all instances and a few are exceptional. The mob scene in the street represents a good sized army of supers, and the first scene, that of a cafe, is also unusually large.

George Moore and Albert Brown agree on all topics but one—politics. They are both enthusiastic about their views, which happen to be opposites, and one day have a falling out.

In later years Brown takes up banking and becomes a candidate for a seat in Parliament. His strongest opponent is the director of one of the largest newspapers, his former chum Moore, who after Brown's election wages a continual war on his methods and principles. To stop this Brown exerts his influence upon the owner of the paper and demands Moore's dismissal. The director obtains a position on a small paper and continues his fight against Brown. Again the Member of Parliament arouses public sentiment against him and he is discharged.

Out of work and unable to get a position, Moore is at his wits end when his wife comes to the rescue. For some time Brown has been paying her attention and tries to induce her to leave her husband. She makes an appointment with him, at his house, drugs him, and searches his desk for incriminating evidence. She finds it in the form of several letters which prove that Brown has misused the trust placed in him. With these letters in his possession Moore's campaign against Brown is successful, and he is reinstated in his old position as director of the city's largest newspaper.

THE general outline of the romantic plot in "The Brand of Bars" has been used before, but the production is justified by the new story and fresh details worked into it. The picture is interesting every minute and the developments connected with the Indian's raid and the capture and rescue of the ranchman's daughter are a little different from anything which has yet appeared in Western dramas inasmuch as the hero earns the title under most discouraging difficulties, and is mistrusted up to the final incident.

Warner's Features, Inc., is distributing the three reel picture which was produced by the United States Film Corporation. The first scene shows Tom Logan in prison. On his release he decides to live straight and, finding no encouragement in the East where everyone shuns him because of his past record, he travels West and manages to secure employment as a ranch-hand. Faithful services earns for him the promotion to foreman which causes the rest of the ranch-hands to become jealous.

Logan meets and greatly admires Rose Brent, the ranch owner's daughter, and is considerably downcast when she informs him of an invitation she has received to visit friends in town. A fiddler arrives at the ranch and it is decided to give a big dance. The cowboys canvass the country for miles around inviting all the young folks to attend. The day on which the big event is to take place Logan surprises a newly hired hand ransacking Mr. Brent's desk. Horrified, he recognizes him as one of his former fellow-convicts, Red Conway. Mr. Brent and a group of cowboys enter the office and Conway accuses Logan of attempting robbery, exposing his past record. Astonished that his most trusted employe is an ex-convict Mr. Brent refuses to hear his explanation and has him locked up in one of the sheds.

With dusk the guests begin to arrive and soon the dance is on in full sway, but Rose, in whose honor the affair was arranged, is not present for, as she could not enjoy it knowing of Logan's enforced confinement, she obtains permission of her father to accept her friends' invitation to visit them and leaves.

From one of the windows of his prison Logan discovers a band of Indans sneaking up to raid the house. He breaks out of the shed and notifies the merrymakers. The attack is repulsed and the raiders are pursued by the cowboys. On the site of the Indians' rendezvous Logan finds Rose's hat. He trails the band to their encampment, sees Rose placed in one of the tents, gets into communication with her, and arranges for her rescue. To his surprise the girl whom his lasso hauls to the top of the cliff is not Rose, but Dawn, an Indian girl.

When the cowboys notice Logan's absence after the fight they start out in pursuit and arrive at the cliff as he is choking Dawn for foiling his attempt to free Rose. The ranchmen scoff at his story until it is confirmed by Dawn as they think that Rose is safe away with her friends. They attack the camp and rescue Rose. In the battle Conway is fatally wounded and dying, confesses that it was he and not Logan that broke into Brent's desk and that, though an ex-convict, Logan had been trying to live a straight life.

The ranch owner begs forgiveness for his former injustice and readily grants his foreman permission to marry Rose.

Contracts for Big Feature

Alberto Amato, vice president of the Picture Playhouse Film Company, Inc., returned from Europe last week on La Lorraine. He had been in Italy and on the Continent for six months securing contracts with the big foreign producers for his company.

He has obtained the American rights to what is said to be a feature production more than fit to be classed with the Pasquali Company's "Quo Vadis?" shown in this country, and comparable to the Itala Company's master production, "Cabiria," which is now running at the Knickerbocker Theater, New York, and elsewhere throughout the country under the direction of Werba & Luescher.

The film was purchased for this country, it is claimed, for $75,000 cash.

Mr. Amato also made several advantageous arrangements with foreign distributors in England and France for handling the Picture Playhouse Company's American productions.

When interviewed in New York Mr. Amato said: "Of course trade conditions in Europe are now in chaos, but when I left the big companies, both producing and distributing, were all combined under a few heads. I was fortunate in securing an option on the entire output of a new manufacturing combination which will be announced in the near future and which will, I think, cause a sensation in the film industry.

"Pasquali & Company have opened a big new studio in Rome, taking over the Celio Company, a subsidiary of the Cines Company, and doubling their producing power in view of the enormous demand for Pasquali films throughout Europe. They have sold eighty copies of "The Silent Bell," a war film, in Spain and France alone, and have disposed of eighty copies of 'Lupin' in England alone.

"With regard to the war, I can only say that we hope for the best. If Italy is successful in keeping out of it we will not be affected at all. If she is drawn in we will, of course, be inconvenienced temporarily, but will not by any means be disabled."

Keanograph Production Approved

After viewing the production of the Keanograph Film Manufacturing Company entitled "Money" Judge William Fowler of San Francisco decided that it was in no way a violation of the law which stated that the reproduction of money in process, photographic or otherwise, is illegal.

Recent Patents in Motography

By David S. Hulfish

No. 1,060,717. For an Improved Stage Noise Appratus. Isued to Ira L. Stanger, Pensauen, N. J., and C. B. Fithian, Philadelphia.

In the framework 6 is a hinged box 8, preferably square, and having a drumhead 9. Upon the drumhead are a large number of large shot 14. A net 10 prevent the shot from escaping. A tapered box 11 is mounted above the drum, forming a sound-modifying chamber 12.

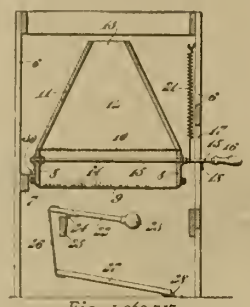

Fig. 1,060,717.

The box may be shifted to shake the shot by use of the handle 16, the spring 21 tending to balance the weight of the drum. The drum head also may be beaten by the drumstick 23 and pedal 27. The inventors state:

Our invention relates to stage noise apparatus, that is to say, the apparatus for simulating noises for the purpose of rendering more realistic the scenic effects of dramatic productions and moving picture exhibitions.

The principal object of our invention is to provide a simple and efficient apparatus for producing a variety of noises for imitating the sound of waves, escaping steam, locomotives, musketry, storms and other noises.

No. 1,061,101. For an Improved Safety Attachment for Motion Picture Projecting Machines. Issued to Charles E. Morton, Edwardsville, Ill. (Application filed March 26, 1910.)

This invention provides means for automatically cutting off that portion of the film which is between the two spools during projection, so that if the film in the film gate becomes ignited all burning of the film at points beyond the feed mechanism will be prevented and the film in the magazines will be protected.

The illustration shows a side view of a projecting head, having feed reel 1 and take-up reel 2 and intermittent mechanism at 3 not shown in detail.

The film A passes through a slot 6 in a support 4. A shearing member is fixed at 13 and a 14 is held by a cord 17 passing over guide pulley 19 and connected to a fusible wire 21, the fusible wire being anchored at 20. A spring is arranged to draw the knife forward to cut the film A when the knife is released by the melting of the fusible wire, the fusible wire of course melting quickly from the heat of the flaming celluloid in case the film in the gate should catch fire.

There is arranged also a knife 30 between the film gate and the take up reel, a spring being arranged to draw the knife to cut the film and a cord being arranged to the fusible wire 21 to hold the knife from cutting except in the case of fire to melt the fuse.

No. 1,062,081. For an Improved Heat Arresting Screen. Issued to Charles H. Converse and W. H. C. Rider, Chicago, Ill.

The improved heat screen is shown at E in the illustration. Coloring devices for tinting the picture are shown at H. Two of the descriptive paragraphs of the patent and one of the five claims, are quoted:

One of the objects of our present invention is to provide an improved heat arresting or protecting screen between the light and the film of the picture apparatus, for the purpose of deflecting or absorbing the heat rays, or a sufficient amount of the heat from the light, as to prevent the temperature of the film from rising to a dangerous degree. We have discovered that by interposing a sheet or screen of celluloid between the arc light of the apparatus and the film, certain heat rays which would otherwise affect the celluloid film, are absorbed or arrested by the celluloid screen, so that the film is protected and remains at a safe degree of temperature.

According to one feature of our improvement, we interpose a sheet E, of transparent celluloid, cellulose, fibroid, or similar material, between the lamp and the film, thus absorbing the heat rays which affect such celluloid material, and rendering the use of the celluloid or similar film perfectly safe. This sheet of celluloid is preferably located near the point where the light emerges from the lens or shaping tube of the lamp house, at which point the circle of light is about three inches in diameter, covering an area of over six square inches, or many times greater than that at which the moving picture film is exposed. As the heat rays are thus spread over such a large area of the celluloid screen, the temperature of the screen at no time rises to a dangerous degree, even when exposed to the light continuously, consequently there is no danger of the screen taking fire, and the film which may be of the usual gelatin coated celluloid, or similar composition, is safely protected from the heat.

In a picture projecting apparatus, the combination with a lamp, and a film of inflammable material, of a heat resisting screen composed of like material and interposed between the lamp and the film.

No. 1,062,324. For an Improved Device for Reproducing "Talking Pictures." Issued to Henry T. Crapo, New York, N. Y., assignor to George R. Webb, Baltimore, Md.

The Graphophone for producing the speech is in this device mounted directly upon the pedestal of the picture projecting machine and both are geared to be driven from the same shaft, by means of chain belts.

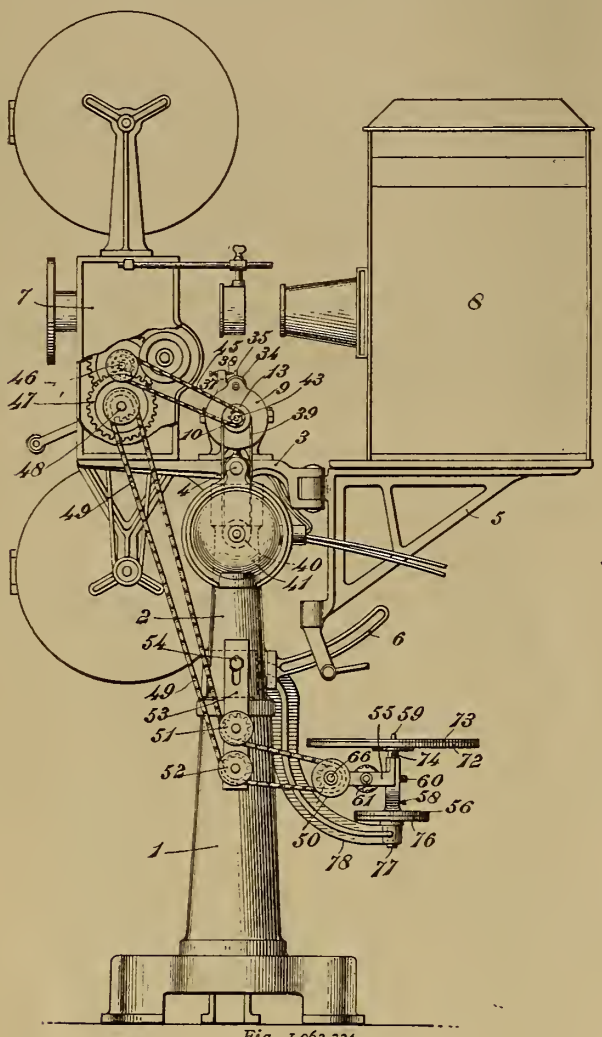

Fig. 1,062,324.

There are seven claims in the patent, the fourth being as follows:

A motion-picture and sound reproducer machine, comprising a motion-picture device, a sound reproducer device, movable knife is placed at 14. The knife said devices being geared to run at relatively different speeds, a drive member, a governor-coupling controlled by the drive member and connecting both of said devices and the drive member to produce unison of action between the picture device and sound reproducer, and means for actuating the governor-coupling to start the picture device and the sound reproducer in unison at a low speed and raise the speed of both devices to the requisite normal running speed in unison with each other, substantially as described.

No. 1,062,932. For an Improved Film Perforating Machine. Issued to Eberhard Schneider, New York, N. Y. (Application filed March 14, 1911.)

The invention provides improvements in a film perforating machine designed to perforate a film upon which pictures have been taken with a camera using a non-perforated film. Such a picture having been made, and it being desired to project the picture by means of projecting machines using perforated film strips, it becomes necessary to perforate the picture strip, and to have the perforations at exactly the same distance as the distance between centers of pictures upon the strip.

To perforate a developed film, the film is mounted in the perforating machine and then either observed directly through a prism or a projection of it is observed on a screen. The location of index marks in the picture is noted with reference to pointers in the perforating machine and the machine then may be adjusted to perforate the margin of the film at the exact spacing required to correspond to the spacing of the pictures.

No. 1,062,622. For an Improved Stereopticon. Issued to A. F. Victor, Davenport, Iowa.

The improvement is in the shape of casing and means and methods of adjustment, care being taken to construct the whole device so that the general optical alignment is not disturbed when the different adjustments are made in using the projector. The device is for lantern slides only.

No. 1,063,207. For an improved Fire Shutter for Moving Picture Projectors. Issued to W. B. Moore and T. H. Armstrong, Chicago, Ill., assignors to Thomas A. Edison, Inc., West Orange, N. J. (Application filed June 25, 1906.)

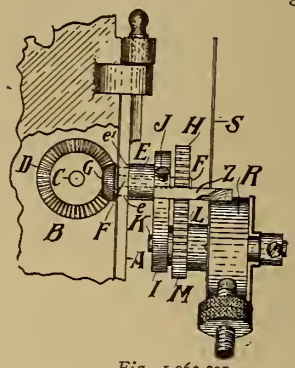

Fig. 1,063,207.

This patent appears to be broad in its claims and should dominate all structures of fire shutters or film-window protective screens. The claims are forty-two in number. Considering the number and scope of its claims, and the early date of filing, the mechanical detail shown becomes of little importance except as it supports the subject matter of the remainder of the patent. The important feature of the patent lies in the claims and of them, seven typical ones are quoted:

1. In a moving picture machine, the combination of a main frame provided with means for imparting a progressive movement to a film, a door hinged thereto, a movable screen carried on said door, and means under the control of the film moving mechanism operable to move said screen when the door is closed and inoperative for this purpose when the door is open, substantially as set forth.

3. In a moving picture machine, the combination of a main frame provided with film moving mechanism, a door hinged thereto, a movable screen on said door, and means for moving said screen located partly on the frame and partly on the door, the parts thereof being operatively positioned with respect to one another only when the door is closed, substantially as set forth.

19. In a moving picture machine, a rotable shaft, a barrel, rotatably mounted weights, a connection between the rotatable shaft and the weights to rotate such weights on the rotation of such shaft and thereby project the weights against the barrel, a screen, such screen, barrel and weights arranged to obtain a connection between them when the weights are projected to move the screen from its initial position, substantially as described.

22. In a moving picture machine, the combination of a movably mounted screen, a friction member operatively connected to said screen, a centrifugal member, means movable thereby into frictional engagement with said friction member and means for rotating said centrifugal member.

25. In a moving picture machine, the combination of a movable screen, a shaft, a hollow cylindrical member loose on said shaft and adapted when rotated to impart movement to said screen, and a weight within the said cylindrical member and rotatable with said shaft.

32. In apparatus of the class described, a movable screen, a revoluble shaft, mechanism whereby said screen is connected with said shaft, devices whereby said mechanism is clutched and unclutched in relation to said shaft, a handle, mechanism through which said handle operates said device, film feeding mechanism, and gearing operated by said handle for operating said feeding mechanism.

34. In apparatus of the class described, a movable screen, a revoluble shaft, mechanism whereby said screen is connected with said shaft, centrifugally operated devices whereby said mechanism is clutched and unclutched in relation to said shaft, and means for revolving said shaft and operating said devices.

No. 1,063,401. For an Improved Lamp for Picture Machines. Issued to A. F. Victor, Davenport, Iowa.

The invention is an improved housing for an incandescent lamp bulb, the arrangement of reflectors and lenses being such that all the rays of the lamp may be directed as a comparatively solid beam. Reflectors are provided both front and rear of the lamp, the front reflector being of longer focal length and having a central opening through which the beam of light may pass.

1,063,401.

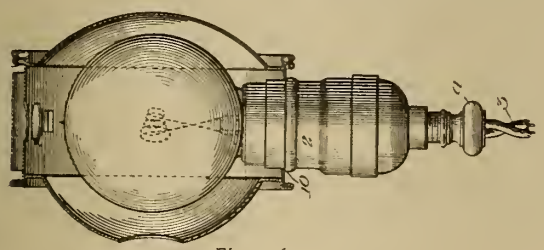

Fig. 1,063,401.

No. 1,064,010. For an Improved Optical Projecting Apparatus. Issued to Alvah C. Roebuck, Chicago, Ill., assignor to The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., Chicago, Ill. (Application filed Feb. 11, 1909.)

This invention relates to multiple dissolving view stereopticons and provides a simple construction of a stereopticon apparatus to so direct the light from a single source of illumination that several lantern slides may be equally lighted at the same time, and projected through several lenses upon the same screen. The several lens systems are so arranged also that the several slides, if for a dissolving view, will be projected upon the picture screen in proper registry. The structural arrangement also is such that the double stereopticon is lighted from the same lamp which serves the motion picture projector.

The illustration shows a table-top plan of the general arrangement of apparatus. The condensers 12, 12 and 11 are not full round in their face outline, but are flatted on the sides where they approach each other, that the axes of the two optical systems may be brought near to each other.

As a specimen of the sixteen claims, claim 3 is quoted:

In a stereopticon, the combination of a pair of stereopticon objectives and a condenser comprising a pair of inner planospherical lens members arranged side by side and having their optical centers adjacent to their adjoining edges, and a pair of outer plano-spherical lens members arranged side by side and having their optical centers in alinement with those of the stereopticon objectives, substantially as set forth.

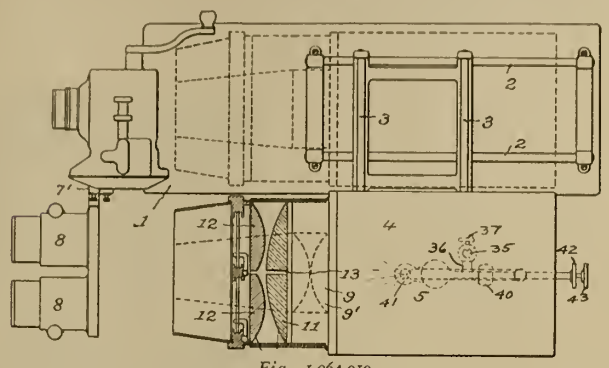

Fig. 1,064,010.

No. 1,064,252. For an Improved Film Gate. Issued to Barton A. Proctor, New York, N. Y., assignor to Picturegraph Co., New York, N. Y.

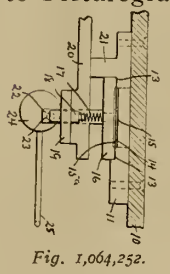

Fig. 1,064,252.

The film gate is shown in a top view in the illustration. The plate 11 and the bracket 20 are rigidly attached to the frame of the projecting machine. The film is shown on end view at 14 and is clamped at its edges 13 and 13 by the friction member 16, which is pressed by the spring 17. The cam 24 which may be moved by the handle 25 draws the member 16 back from the plate 11 to permit the threading of the gate.

Production of "Silver King" Postponed

Guy Standing, whose selection for the leading role in the Famous Players production of "The Silver King" was recently announced, is captain in a noted English regiment, and when the announcement that England had declared war was officially confirmed, Standing's military zeal immediately appeared and he decided to return and assist his native country.

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players, impressed by the patriotic loyalty of the star, consented to a postponement of the production and Standing sailed last week on the Lusitania, to take his place in a more vital drama even that that of the "Silver King."

Horsley Installs Linotype

David Horsley has installed a $5,000 linotype machine in the title department of the Centaur Film Co., at Bayonne, and also a complete job press. With such an equipment, all of the formerly difficult tricks of title work, such as reproductions of newspaper stories, in foreign languages, becomes easy, and by the same process artistic cards can be made up at a much lower cost than under the old scheme. Three new special-lens cameras, perfected by a new device invented by Mr. Horsley, have also been put in operation.

Brevities of the Business

Lubinville is bereft of Bennie. Indefatigable, irrepressible, ubiquitous, inimitable—the grasping hand of Opportunity has at last seized Bennie of Lubinville and whisked him away to disseminate his talents upon the virgin field of another colony of photoplayers. The nineteen-year-old boy who is known to nearly every person in filmdom will, in the future, promote publicity for the Liberty Motion Picture Company of Germantown, Philadelphia. During four years with the Lubin Company he built up a following of friends which would do credit to a veteran traveling salesman. Though nominally telephone operator Bennie found time to familiarize himself with every branch of the great plant and was equally at ease with the scenario editor or a property boy. His efficiency at his own desk made him a veritable diplomat of the switchboard. Tireless in his kindness to everyone, a budget of correct information, the little live wire of Lubinville developed a faculty of drawing friends and keeping them such as a great statesman might envy. He shared the chafing-dish luncheon of his favorite screen heroine and presented an ice cream cone to his pet princess of the factory with equal finish and earnestness. It is predicted that Bennie will one day be the power behind the suffragette throne! This will make clear why his small army of well-wishers presented him with a handsome timepiece, suitably inscribed, and a chain. Bennie of Libertyville—nee Lubinville—is really a glowing example of what all the copy-book and sunday school precepts fail to get over and we warrant that before long he will monopolize a page in "Who's Who in Filmdom."

When you go to New York and drop into the offices of the Life Photo Film Corporation very likely you will run into a smiling-faced chap looking very much like the picture which accompanies this. He stands about five foot three, weighs about 150 lbs., and his official cognomen is Edward M. Roskam, after which appears the title, president of The Life Photo Film Corporation.

Starting in the film business way back when the fifty-foot single scene films were considered proper show material Roskam put in a couple of years with the Vitagraph Company under Albert E. Smith, where the laboratory work claimed part of his time and it was here that the ground work for his present success was built.

In 1906 young Roskam went with the Independent Motion Picture Company when they built their first plant at 111 East 14th street, New York City. For four years every film turned out by this company was under the personal laboratory direction of Roskam who also supervised the assembling of players and material for every production.

After reaching the general managership of that concern he decided to utilize his knowledge in building up a business of his own, so he organized the Commercial Motion Picture Company which besides doing industrial work did all the printing, developing, toning and tinting for concerns like Ramo, a large quantity of Universal films and other New York companies who had come to rely on the genius of the young man at the head.

The company branched out and when an opportunity presented itself young Roskam succeeded in interesting Mr. Bernard Loewenthal with the result that Mr. Loewenthal financed the incorporation of the Life Photo Film Corporation and the new company began to produce features. With the new factory just being completed by this company at Grantwood, N. J., they rank among the leading producers of feature films in this country.

During the past summer Mr. Roskam went to London and established a European branch sales office, The American & Continental Film Company, to handle their productions in England and on the Continent.

The company has just finished the production of "Captain Swift" in their new studio and the film version of "Northern Lights," a picture costing $32,000.00 to complete, shows that the company is willing to go to any expense to produce good feaures.

Mr. Roskam is married, has two children and when the Giants are at the Polo Grounds, he can tell you exactly how many curves Matthewson threw on any day because he was there and saw them.

Following the success of her first novelette "In Tune with the Wild," Kathlyn Williams is working on two more stories, "Chip of the Flying 'U'" and "The Fifth's Man." The Selig Company will produce the film versions of the works in the near future.

A San Francisco scribe has this to say about William Garwood of the American: "A man who, almost without action, so puts his thoughts and meaning on the screen that we understand and are held fascinated by the personality which can convey a tragedy or the awakening of love by means of expression and the quiet movement of a hand. It is consummate artistry."

Colin Campbell of the western Selig studio, has produced 44 reels of pictures during the past six months.

Headed by John H. Pratt, the new all star director, and former leading man and director for the Reliance Company, who has been for the past six months allied with the All Star Feature Corporation in the capacity of master of studios and assistant to Augustus Thomas, the All Star Company players, numbering twenty-seven, left the early part of this week for the shores of Maine to begin the production of James A. Herne's immortal drama of down east folk, "Shore Acres."

Bessie Eyton wants to know what she has done to suffer this burst of enthusiasm on the part of an unknown correspondent. The Kathlyn Williams novelette series has started something, evidently:

Your hair is red
Your eyes are blue;
Why don't you write
For Selig, too?

Gaby Deslys, the celebrated international star, whom President Zuker of the Famous Players engaged on the eve of her departure for Paris a few weeks ago, last week began work in an important feature for that concern in London.

Tom Mix, the cowboy actor of the western Selig Company, has completed one of O. Henry's strongest dramas. Unusual strength and prolonged excitement characterize the sterling screen showing.

Following a wild race between George Field and Jack Richardson, the "Flying A" "villuns," to see which would be the first to secure an automobile, Miss Vivian Rich, the leading lady of the company, decided it was not in keeping with the order of things to let said "villuns" outclass her, so now the three of them have cars.

Mrs. Carl Laemmle, wife of President Laemmle of the Universal, was in the heart of the war zone in Germany during the recent mobilization of troops and though strenuous efforts were made to get her aboard a ship sailing for America, at last reports she was being detained on the German frontier. The American consul in Germany and Senator James Hamilton Lewis have been called upon for assistance.

Starting Monday, August 10th, the Vitagraph Theater will show "The Painted World," written by Jacques Futrelle, and "A Florida Enchantment," written by Archibald Clavering Gunter.

The personnel of the company include Ormi Hawley, Edgar Jones, Louise Huff, Earl Metcalfe, Kempton Greene, Herbert Fortier, Arthur Matthews, Eleanor Barry and a dozen others.

An echo of the titanic struggle that is now rending the nations of Europe comes in the announcement of the sailing on Wednesday, August 5, on the steamship La Lorraine of Henry Gachon, photographic expert of the Universal's Bayonne Laboratories. M. Gachon was accompanied by his wife and A. R. Ferrand, recently American manager of the Eclipse-Urban Film Company. Monsieur Gachon, who came to this country last winter is a corporal in the French army reserves, and Monsieur Ferrand is credited with the rank of lieutenant.

Victor Potel, the famous "Slippery Slim" of the Essanay Western comedies, has been nick-named "Six O'Clock" by his friends. He is straight up and down, they say.

Alexander Dunn has joined the Optigraph Manufacturing Company, Chicago and will act in the capacity of salesman in the future.

The "Thanhouser Eight," the only rowing crew in the moving picture industry, competed successfully in the big amateur rowing regatta August 8 in Philadelphia. The "Thanhouser" crew was taken to Philadelphia by Carroll Fleming, director at the New Rochelle Studio and was composed of Irving Cummings, William Noel, Toots Brady, William Carroll, Clayton Cole, Frank Murphy, Charles Howe, Robert Marchang, John Scott, and George Sullivan.

Miss Eleanor O'Keefe, who will be remembered as the right bower of Tom D. Cochrane during the first two years of the Imp Company, and who is frequently referred to as "The girl who put the Imp in Independent Motion Pictures," has been acquired by David Horsley and has already taken up important duties at the Bayonne studio.

William Bechtel of the Edison Company has just returned from a four weeks' stay at Mt. Clemens, Mich., where he was recovering from a severe attack of rheumatic trouble.

"Love and Surgery," is the title of the first H. Pathe Lehrman comedy being made for release under the new "L. K. O." Universal brand. It is a characteristic "Lehrman" product and in it two notable actors of the vaudeville world, Billie Ritchie and Gertrude Selby, will be seen for the first time in pictures.

A dinner of sumptious proportions was tendered to Octavia Handworth recently by the management of the Stevens House, Lake Placid's largest hotel. Some five hundred guests sat down to the tables, among whom were many prominent New York society people.

William Robinson, of the Essanay Company, is said to be the oldest man in motion pictures. Mr. Robinson was seventy-three years old his last birthday, but is as spry as the average man of forty.

Colonel Jasper E. Brady of the Vitagraph has completed the scenarios of "The Island of Regeneration" and "Britton of the Seventh," both from novels written by his brother, the Rev. Cyrus T. Brady, LLD.

Charlotta de Felice, late of the Vitagraph Company, now leading woman with the United Keanograph Film Company of Fairfax, Cal., is greatly worried by the European war as all her kinsfolk on her mother's side are French and she now has two uncles and three cousins in the French Army.

Edna Goodrich and Irene Warfield have been engaged by the Lasky Feature Company to appear in forthcoming productions.

The Biograph Company have announced their intention of adding another one-reel production to their weekly program as well as another two-reeler each week. The former will be released on Friday and the latter on Tuesday.

Mr. Edgar M. Lewis, the Life Photo Film Corporation's director, has resigned, in order to take a much needed rest. Mr. Will S. Davis, formerly head director of the Ramo Film Company will succeed him.

Director J. W. Kelley and cameraman Angel are among the latest arrivals at the Eclair Western Studios, Tucson, Arizona. Mr. Kelley is hard at work on his first picture 'neath Arizona skies.

Pauline Bush will be featured in a new Rex company now being organized at the Hollywood studios of the Universal. Miss Bush will be supported by Lon Chaney, Joseph King, and other tried actors and Joseph de Grasse will act as her director.

Anthony Wuentz, an Edison actor was struck by lightning during the terrific storm of a few days ago. Although suffering from the severe shock Wuentz will be able to resume his duties in a few weeks.

The Commercial Motion Pictures Company at Grantwood, N. J., possess a plant that is a model of neatness and is thorough in every respect. All the machinery formerly in the plant of the company at 102 West 101st street was disposed of and entirely new machinery put in at Grantwood.

Richard Travers of the Essanay dramatic company is now an actor-producer. His first picture, "An Old-Fashioned Girl," more than pleased his employers, and they predict that with a little experience he will be a wizard.

The marriage of Allen M. Davey, a photographic expert at the Universal plant at Hollywood, Cal., and a brother-in-law of David Horsley, president of the Centaur Film Company, to Margaret M. Bronaugh in Los Angeles, California, on June 30th, has just been announced.

Harry Handworth and William A. Williams, president and vice president of the Excelsior Feature Film Company Inc. have returned to the studio at Lake Placid, N. Y., after a short business trip to New York City.

H. O. Bodine, he who had planned to be in sunny Italy by now, spreading the doctrine of the Raw Film Company, is safely ensconced on the top floor of the building at 15 East Twenty-sixth street reading the latest war news and wondering when he can continue his trip. He made a perfectly good start and was two days on the water when orders came for the President Grant to right about face and find the New York harbor as speedily as possible.

Sidney Goldin, who has been at the head of the Goldin Feature Film Co., has severed connection with them and in the future he can be found in his new offices in the Broadway Theater building, where he is preparing a feature film, "The Robbers."

Frank Tichenor and Dan Maney of the Photo Play Production Company, were hosts at a private showing of "The Littlest Rebel." The film won the approbation of all present.

F. B. Cannock, secretary of the Precision Machine Company, Inc., announces the resignation of H. B. Coles and the appointment of Joseph E. Graef as acting general manager of that concern.

C. Lang Cable, Jr., called a conference of the branch office managers of the Ramo Film Company on Sunday, August 9, and the day was spent in the company's laboratories.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in MOTOGRAPHY as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

VENDETTA

FROM THE NOVEL BY MARIE CORELLI

Five Parts (5071) Feet

Quite the Most Beautiful, Realistic and Absorbing Novel the Famous English Novelist Has Yet Written

A Man Buried as Dead, returning to consciousness in his coffin, knocking it by his struggles from its niche in the wall; thereby breaking open a casket filled with jewels; smashing his way out the tomb to his castle only to find his wife and dearest friend unfaithful to him; plotting a revenge Hellish in its execution; the killing of his faithless wife in that self-same tomb by earthquake the night of his second marriage to her—these are the essentials of a story we firmly believe unrivaled in the annals of filmed Novels. One thrill treads upon the footsteps of another. Pantomime finds its highest expression in "VENDETTA."

The settings are more than beautiful—the photography as clear and brilliant as a mountain stream. In "VENDETTA" we offer all that is possible in Motion Photography.

Brady Story a Film Success

William Courtleigh Stars

WILLIAM COURTLEIGH is not only leading man but the actual core of "The Better Man," the Famous Players latest picture. His role, Rev. Mark Stebbing, is the keystone of the story's construction. The action in every case is either incited by him or reverts directly to him. This is not in any way due to lack of proper support, however, for with Arthur Hoopes as Rev. Lionel Barmore, Alice Claire Elliott as Margaret Wharton, Robert Broderick as General Wharton, and William Randall as Penrod one could hardly wish for a more capable or well selected cast. The one and only reason why the picture has a "one man" effect is because it is not broad in its action, deep and powerful though it undoubtedly is.

It is a four reel dramatization of the book of that name by Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, and is staged under the direction of Francis Powers, and with Rev. Brady's supervision.

The exterior scenes are wonderfully realistic, many of them being taken right in the heart of the slums and including numbers of the exact type of people necessary to give the correct atmosphere and significance to the serious work chosen by Mark Stebbing. In "mob" scenes requiring certain kinds of action, as in the strike scene, paid supers are used in abundance. The interior settings and photography are up to Famous Players usual high standard.

The first few scenes are in the nature of a prelude to the story. In them strong contrasts are drawn between the natures and ideals of the two clergymen, Rev. Mark Stebbing and Rev. Lionel Barmore. Standing on one of the promontories of New York

Margoret mentally contrasts her luxurious home with the poverty of St. Osmond's.

City Barmore chooses to see only the height of civilization attained in the wealthy section while Stebbing is more interested in the other side which affords a view of the depths of poverty. As they turn to leave, Barmore is approached by a beggar to whom he gives his card. Stebbings idea of charity, however, is different. He administers to the man's immediate need by giving him a piece of money.

Both clergymen are in love with the same girl, Margaret Wharton, the daughter of the capitalist, General Wharton. She is in doubt which to favor as her admiration of Barmore's finely polished manner and cultviated taste is equalled by her deep regard for Stebbing's plain sincerity in his efforts to help the poor.

The bishop of the diocese offers Stebbing his choice of two rectorates; one over the fashionable St. Hilda's church and the other over the church of the slums, St. Osmund's. Stebbing sees St. Osmund's as the church in which he might best serve God and chooses it. Later, Barmore is delighted to learn that he has been appointed rector of St. Hilda's church. When Margaret learns Stebbing's choice she offers him a check for $5,000 to assist him in his work, but he refuses it explaining that he wishes to accomplish his object without outside assistance.

In his work Stebbing meets several of General Wharton's workmen and is the means of preventing the carrying out of a plot to dynamite Wharton's works. He familiarizes himself with the working conditions and grievances of the men and intercedes for them with Wharton, obtaining a 15 per cent increase in their salaries.

Barmore proposes to Margaret, but she evades answering definitely and promises him that he may hope. The same day Stebbing presses his suit and receives the same answer, but misunderstands it as a bashful "yes" and embraces and kisses her. Angered by this action Margaret sends for Barmore and accepts him in Stebbing's presence.

The bishop dies and Wharton promises Barmore to endorse him as a candidate at the election to fill the vacancy. At about the same time Wharton reduces the wage scale of his employes, depriving them of further benefit of the 15 per cent increase. They strike and a number of strike-breakers are hired to fill their places.

At the bishop's election Stebbing is named as a candidate. He offers to withdraw in favor of Barmore if Wharton will compromise with his men, but the general refuses. Shortly afterward Stebbing is summoned to quell the fight between the strikers and their successors, and learns that some of the strike-breakers have imprisoned Margaret in an oil house and set fire to it hoping that the blame will be laid to the strikers. At great risk to himself, Stebbing rescues Margaret, and returns to the scene of the trouble. A missile intended for one of the strike-breakers strikes Stebbing on the head and he falls unconscious.

The old bishop's tired heart gives way.

When he comes to Margaret is kneeling at his side telling him that he is her choice as "The Better Man." Stebbing is elected bishop but he resigns in favor of Barmore.

The closing scene shows the Rev. and Mrs. Mark Stebbing at the altar receiving the blessing of the new bishop.

John Barrymore Again Engaged

John Barrymore, one of the most popular of the younger leading players of the day, has been re-engaged by the Famous Players Film Company for his second appearance in motion pictures produced by that concern, and will appear in Du Souchet's famous comedy success, "The Man from Mexico." Mr. Barrymore made his debut before the motion picture camera a few months ago in the Famous Players' film version of the celebrated play, "An American Citizen," which has been recorded as one of the greatest feature comedies ever produced on the screen.

Produced with flattering success in every city throughout the country, the noted play has won a distinguished place in theatrical history as one of the best laugh-producers of the present dramatic epoch. The play introduces John Fitzhew, a young married man, who loves his wife, but who also loves the bright lights of the cafes and cabarets. One night, when he believes his wife has gone to her mother's, he plans with his friend Majors to take in a tango racket at a very "risky" cafe. Unfortunately for him, wifie has not yet left the house, and overhears the gay plan. She decides to visit the place in question and observe hubby. There is a raid in the cafe that night, and while Fitzhew escapes, wifie is caught and is forced to give a fictitious name and address to the police.

Meanwhile, Fitzhew gets in a fight with a cabman, is arrested, and is given thirty days and a few hours to straighten out his affairs at home before starting for the Island. In order to keep his destination from his wife, Fitzhew tells her he is going to Mexico for thirty days. When he is finally released, he hires a Mexican costume, and goes home, to find his family have decorated the place in Spanish colors, and are all wearing the dress of Mexico.

He attempts to speak Spanish to them, and finds they have learned the language in his absence. The trouble that he has had now dwindles beside the dilemma of explaining the customs and manners of Mexico to his over-wise family. Of course, his duplicity is finally discovered but as usual, he comes out with flying colors, and the story ends with the man from Mexico again cleverly pulling the wool over wifie's eyes.

The situations in the play are just the kind that adapt themselves to John Barrymore's original methods of expressing difficulties and annoyances in a ludicrous manner.

Presents Film to President

A moving picture of Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, who died at the White House recently has been presented to President Wilson by the Gaumont Company. The picture shows Mrs. Wilson and her youngest daughter, Miss Jessie—now Mrs. Frances B. Sayre—on vacation in New England last summer and is the same picture which was shown in Mutual Weekly No. 85, issued shortly after Mrs. Wilson's death.

In the belief that the President might care to have such a picture showing his wife at one of her happiest moments, the Gaumont Company requested its Washington representative to get in touch with Secretary Tumulty and through him offer the picture to the president. This was shortly after Mrs. Wilson's funeral. Secretary Tumulty conveyed the offer and the President was so gratified that he asked if he might have two pictures. His request, of course, was granted.

The picture showed Mrs. Wilson and Miss Jessie arriving at the railroad station at Concord, N. H. on their way to their summer retreat in the mountains.

A Real Old Time Comedy to Be Released

"Susie's New Shoes"

ON Tuesday, August 25, the American Film Manufacturing Company will offer via its Beauty brand, a real old time comedy of a riotous sort. It's a type of comedy which is sure to get the laughs and yet does not depend upon knockabout or slapstick work to provoke the smiles. Everything moves smoothly along toward the climax and giggles, titters and laughs galore are sure to be heard as the story approaches the point at which waves of laughter are due to sweep over the audience.

Director Pollard has taken the audience into his confidence and shows them in advance what is likely to happen, so that everyone is primed for the big laugh which they surmise is just ahead. The situations pile one upon another, each adding a new complication to the tangle which already exists, and occasionally a new character is introduced who, in his or her turn, adds another twist to the plot. Best of all, the whole story is clean and wholesome. There is nothing suggestive or out of the way in the entire comedy and the story is such a commonplace one that everybody will be sure to appreciate and enjoy it to the full.

Marguerita Fischer is the heroine of the tale, and Mary Scott, as "Mrs. Riley," does a splendid bit of character work. Harry Pollard himself appears as the husband of the lady who needs shoes, and Joseph Harris in the role of the blind beggar has some of the cleverest business that has been seen on the screen of late. Fred Gamble as the important policeman has a part well suited to his ability and makes the most out of every opportunity

As the picture begins we behold Susanna and William Van Dusen on their front porch busily reading the war news. Suddenly Mrs. Van Dusen turns over the page of her newspaper and discovers a bargain sale of shoes.

Glancing down at her own trim tootsies, she decides that she is badly in need of some new footwear and accordingly beseeches friend husband to finance her shopping expedition. Van Dusen declares that the shoes she is wearing are plenty good enough and suggests that if anybody is going to have new shoes it should be himself. Mrs. Van Dusen stubbornly insists that she must take advantage of the bargain sale, and so to appease her Mr. Van Dusen draws from an inner pocket his billfold, hoping thereby to prove to his affectionate spouse that he is "broke."

To his consternation Mrs. Van Dusen calmly appropriates the billfold and all its contents. She hastens into the house to don her street costume and Van Dusen, after recovering from his surprise, hastens after her. In the parlor he discovers her handbag and, venturing to look within, he beholds his billfold. An idea strikes him, and stealthily he withdraws the billfold and replaces the handbag in exactly the position he had found it.

Mrs. Van Dusen, a few moments later, returns, grabs up her handbag, and smiling triumphantly at her better half sets off for the bargain sale. Following her departure Van Dusen smiles broadly to himself over his cleverness in foiling her, and, picking up a magazine, sits down to await his wife's return.

Downtown, Mrs. Van Dusen glances over the window display at the shoe stores, makes her selection, and enters to try on the footwear she has determined to buy. On the same bench at which she finds a vacant seat is Mrs. Riley, a corpulent Irish lady, who is keeping one tired shoe salesman and the proprietor himself busy attending to her wants. Eventually she selects a pair of shoes and departs.

The policeman listened to the arguments of both ladies.

Mrs. Van Dusen tries on several pairs of shoes and after a time finds a pair to her liking. When looking down at the bench at her side she discovers her handbag is missing and that another has been left in its place, she grows well nigh hysterical, but chancing to remember the Irish customer who has so recently departed, she decides the lady has taken her handbag by mistake and sets out immediately to recover it.

Mrs. Riley has meanwhile discovered that she is not carrying her own handbag and turning about she returns to the shoestore. At the door the two ladies meet and an explanation and exchange of handbags follows. Mrs. Van Dusen decides to wear home the shoes she has purchased, and dives into her handbag to find her purse. Great is her surprise and astonishment upon discovering that there is no purse within the handbag.

In a flash she recalls the Irish lady—the exchanged handbags—the promptness with which Mrs. Riley had vanished after getting back her own handbag. Instantly Mrs. Van Dusen becomes certain that Mrs. Riley has robbed her. Not waiting to explain matters she darts out of the shoestore in pursuit of the supposed thief. At the corner she beholds Mrs. Riley bestowing an offering upon a blind beggar. Rushing up, Mrs. Van Dusen demands her pocketbook. Mrs. Riley indignantly denies knowing aught of the pocketbook in question. Mrs. Van Dusen grows more excited. Mrs. Riley grows more indignant. Officer Gamble appears at this moment and to him the two ladies tell their troubles.

The proprietor of the shoestore has meanwhile discovered that Mrs. Van Dusen departed without paying for her purchase and he instantly suspects her of being a shoplifter and sends his clerk forth to apprehend her. The new complication rather puzzles Officer Gamble, so he drags both ladies to the police station. From there Mrs. Van Dusen calls up her hubby and demands that he come to police court at once and assist her.

Greatly perturbed over the telephone message, Van Dusen hastens to court and learns from his wife the sad and surprising tale of her day's adventures. Imagining that he sees an easy way out of the whole thing he craftily, cautiously and surreptitiously slips the billfold from his inner pocket into his wife's handbag. A moment later when, in explaining the matter to the judge, Mrs. Van Dusen thrusts her hand into her handbag she discovers the lost pocketbook. A dazed look creeps over her face, and then she bursts into tears, for she supposes she must have been at fault in the whole matter, that the pocketbook must have been in the handbag all the time and that in her excitement she failed to discover it.

The judge rules the case out of court, and after settling with the shoe clerk for the shoes, paying Mrs. Riley enough to salve her injured feelings, and thanking Officer Gamble for his courtesy to her, Mrs. Van Dusen and her husband set out for home. Behind them hobbles the blind beggar. And as they turn into the walk that leads up to their cosy home, the beggar follows along behind.

Scarcely has Mrs. Van Dusen gone to her boudoir, leaving her husband alone in the parlor, than the housemaid introduces the beggar who has called to see the man of the house. To Van Dusen the beggar explains that he is not blind, but has seen the mysterious passage of the billfold from Van Dusen's pocket to Mrs. Van Dusen's handbag and that unless he "gets his" the whole story will be told to Mrs. Van Dusen.

At first Van Dusen is angry, but as he understands the complications likely to ensue if Mrs Van Dusen learns of his perfidy, and the supreme nerve of the "blind" man dawns upon him more and more, his wrath softens and reaching into his trousers pocket he draws out his last five dollar bill and hands it meekly to the blind beggar.

A Bird's-eye Film of Chicago

Monday morning, August seventeenth, one of Motography's reviewers was privileged to see some seven hundred feet of film taken by Roy Knabenshue from his dirigible airship, while flying over Chicago. The pictures are surprisingly good and, of course, entirely out of the ordinary. The photography is clear cut and sharp, and there is no difficulty, even without the subtitles in recognizing the many points of interest in and about Chicago. Flying over the loop district, Knabenshue has directed his air craft in such a fashion that close-up views have been obtained of the great stores on State street, the Masonic Temple and the lake front. Splendid views of Washington and Jackson parks, the Field Museum, the thousands of bathers at Jackson and Manhattan beaches, and the residence portion of the city are given and some wonderful views of the big dirigible itself.

Mr. Knabenshue expects shortly to incorporate a company for the purpose of taking and exploiting motion pictures of cities throughout the United States, the various national parks, and other points of the scenic grandeur, all the film being taken from the Knabenshue dirigible.

"Littlest Rebel" Has Wartime Thrill

Captures All Hearts

THE film version of "The Littlest Rebel" will capture all hearts just as surely as did the play of that title. For, though it has war as its inspiration and background, it has hearts as its dominant power and a film that deals in hearts is a film for everybody.

So well has "The Littlest Rebel" been staged, so finely have its characters been portrayed, so coherently does the story unravel itself, and so correct is its atmosphere that the word perfection might well apply to the finished result.

The film is in six parts and the interest is keen throughout. The first four reels lead up to the final two of splendid battle scenes, though the action of the story does not limit itself to these closing reels. Mimi Yvonne's clever portrayal of Virgie, the child who is the littlest rebel, has the enthusiastic approval of the spectators. She is a wonderfully talented little actress and does all things with a grace that is entirely natural. There appears to be nothing of premeditation in her work—and therein lies one of its charms.

Little Virgie entertains the Northern officer.

E. K. Lincoln as Captain Carey pleases in his role of southern gentleman and scout. His work is marked by a finesse that makes for a finished performance. The markedly good characterization by William J. Sorrelle, that of Lieutenant-Colonel Morrison, is next in lead to Mr. Lincoln. Martin Reagan as Uncle Billy, the faithful slave, is enjoyably realistic, and the character of Sally Ann, a slave, is that of Elaine Evans, who is Topsy-like in this well-played role. Paul Pilkington and Bert S. Frank as the Dudley brothers assume the roles of "heavy," and the one other person who presents a strong portrayal is Estelle Coffin as the wife of Herbert Carey.

To those not familiar with the story, the following synopsis will interest: The Dudley brothers are discharged from the Carey estate, and at the call to arms they join the northern army, while their former employer, Herbert Carey, becomes a scout in that of the South. Carey leaves his wife and little daughter Virgie in the care of the colored slaves, Uncle Billy and little Sally Ann. On one occasion of a stolen visit to them a Northern regiment under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Morrison comes to search the Carey home and the southern scout takes a hurried leave. Jim Dudley is the man at the head of the searching party and insults Mrs. Carey by embracing her. He is seen by Morrison, who orders him out of his command. Dudley returns by the rear way, sets fire to the house, and runs down the front path in full view of Morrison, who shoots him down. And Joe Dudley vows vengeance upon his commander.

Uncle Billy and Sally Ann care for their mistress and Virgie in a little shack formerly used by the overseer. Sally Ann tires of the monotony of things and runs away. Then comes the death of Mrs. Carey and the return of Carey in a spy's suit of blue. He and Virgie bury the body and later Carey returns with a pass to take Virgie through the Confederate ranks to safety in Richmond. A party in command of Morrison and with orders to arrest the scout, Carey, approach the shack and Carey tells Virgie to tell her first lie—that he left by way of the woods. He hides in the attic, pulls the ladder up after him and Virgie tells a "whopper." While the men are scouring the woods, Morrison and the child become friends. Carey makes an accidental move and Morrison orders him down. Virgie has secured his sympathy, however, and he is impressed with Carey's situation, so countersigns the pass and orders Carey to hide as the men return. Dudley suggests exploring the attic, but Morrison orders his men forward.

Carey and Virgie begin their march to Richmond. They make a camp, but are forced to hide at the approach of northern soldiers. Virgie has forgotten her doll, and when a soldier spears it on the end of his bayonet Virgie rushes out to its rescue. Carey is brought out and both are prisoners. Morrison comes up with the remainder of his men, and while he and Carey are in discussion Dudley leaves for headquarters with the tale of Morrison's having let Carey escape. He returns with an order for Morrison's arrest and finds a battle on. Carey and Virgie keep out of the way until Carey sees Morrison surrounded by southern soldiers, when he effects his rescue.

Both Morrison and Carey are put under arrest and a court-martial is ordered for them. Lieutenant Harris (Frederick Fleck), a lawyer and friend of both men, intercedes with General Grant and the latter sends for the men sentenced to die. As he is hearing their case, Virgie slips past the guards and presents a stronger case than either could have done, with the result that the general pardons both and returns Carey's pass for himself and Virgie with the words: "I can't honor the pass of Colonel Morrison, but I do honor that of your general, Robert E. Lee."

The victory is Virgie's and she celebrates by climbing on the rungs of the general's chair and kissing him. Then, saluting, with her father and Lieutenant Morrison, she and the men file out, Morrison to his command and Virgie and her father to safety within the Richmond lines.

Would Organize a Board of Trade

A circular was received this week from William Fox, president of the Greater New York Film Rental Company, in which Mr. Fox proposes a plan for organizing a body, such as a Board of Trade, for instance, that shall represent the interests of the independent film distributors and exchanges. Mr. Fox, in referring to the need for the organization, says: "The motion picture trust became powerful only because manufacturers worked as a unit with the General Film Company. Some of the independent manufacturers are now following in their steps. We can work together in the same way, but with a higher purpose.

William Fox.

"To take the first steps towards such an organization, a meeting of independent manufacturers, exchange men and exhibitors will be held at the Hotel McAlpin, Thirty-fourth street and Broadway, New York City, on August 29, at 11 a. m."

One of the most important needs of such a body Mr. Fox points out is to watch anti-trust legislation and the Clayton bill in particular. Referring to the Clayton bill Mr. Fox says in his circular letter:

"The Clayton bill is now before Congress. While it deals with trusts in a general way, it is advisable that it shall contain some specific provisions to be of the greatest benefit to independents. Through my counsel, Rogers & Rogers, of New York, I have personally given much attention to this matter. Mr. Gustavus A. Rogers of that firm has appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary and has made certain arguments and recommendations. Partly, if not largely, through his instrumentality several amendments important to our business have already been made to the bill, and his arraignment of the Motion Picture Patents Company contains the best statement of our position and the reason therefor ever given.

"Mr. Rogers suggests that Section 6 of the bill be so amended that an equity judgment or decree shall constitute conclusive evidence of the facts instead of prima facie evidence, as now provided, and that decrees in suits by the United States now pending shall be available for use as evidence by private parties; that Section 3, which penalizes the owner or operator of a mine for refusing to sell his product to a responsible party, be broadened to include the manufacturer or operator in any commodity; that the bill shall make it unlawful to terminate established trade relations between parties for the purpose of creating or furthering a monopoly, and that a party injured by such termination shall have right to legal action for relief.

"Mr. Rogers argues that unless specific statutory provision be made to prevent concerns which control a considerable percentage of a commodity from refusing arbitrarily to sell to responsible parties, the small man is at the mercy of 'big business.'"

Ramo's War Film

The first European negative for the Ramo Films, Inc. big production entitled "The War of Wars" arrived in New York on Sunday, August 9. A print was made and exhibited and was found to be a surprisingly beautiful film. It will consequently help to make "The War of Wars" one of the greatest of all war photo-dramas. Considerable more film reached New York for the Ramo Company on Thursday, August 13. The first print was finished and ready for the various offices of the Ramo Company and its numerous bookings on Saturday, August 15.

Submarine Pictures Shown

The submarine pictures taken by the Williamson brothers in the waters adjacent to the Bahama Islands, descriptions of which have been printed in Motography, were put on exhibition Tuesday, August 12, at the Museum of Natural History in New York. J. W. Kellette directed the exhibition, which was the second public showing of these unusual subjects, the first having been before the Smithsonian Institute.

The display began with many scenes of Bahama life and landscapes on New Providence and Watling's Islands. Then followed scenes from the bottom of the ocean, with the coral formations and plant life found there, and a number of varieties of fish, which, it was said, had never been photographed before. The film showed the entire processes of the sponge fishery, which is one of the leading industries of the Bahamas. More interesting than this, however, was an excellent display of the diving skill of the negro boys, who surround liners in their skiffs and dive for pennies thrown from the decks.

Another feature was an illustration of the methods used in catching sharks. The submarine cinematograph caught the sharks fighting each other for food, the letting down of the bait, the struggle on the hook, and finally the killing of the man-eater as they were brought to the surface. At the climax of the show was shown a film of J. E. Williamson diving with a knife in his teeth, fighting and killing a shark under water in front of the camera, and returning safely to the outer air, the doer of this deed being present in the audience to receive congratulations at the close of the show.

The Submarine Film Corporation has been formed to put these pictures on the market. The company is organized under the laws of Virginia and has a capitalization of $100,000. Among the incorporators are T. S. Southgate, Nathaniel Beaman, A. F. Cathey, C. R. Capps, G. M. Wilkinson, who will be secretary-treasurer, and J. E. Williamson, who will be general manager. C. J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, is one of the stockholders and will have charge of the distribution of all the company's subjects.

American Couple Aid Royal Lovers

An Appealing Romance

ON Friday, September 4, the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company will release a two-reel romantic drama adapted from the Munsey Magazines, which is a masterpiece of that style of production. "Under Royal Patronage" is the title and Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne appear in the leading roles, supported by a number of skillful players.

The locale of the story is an imaginary kingdom of Europe and the scenes, both interior and exterior, about the supposed palace of the ruler are gorgeous. No expense has been spared in giving the throne room and the other apartments the elaborate furnishings necessary to establish the correct atmosphere. The majority of the exterior scenes were taken on one of Chicago's most beautiful estates and, without considering any of the other worthy points of the film, these alone would suffice to make it popular.

Count Karl leads Savage to Prince Francis.

The chief charm, however, lies in the acting, for Francis X. Bushman is ideally cast as an adventurous young American of the Anthony Hope style, which will ever be popular with the public. Beverly Bayne is delightfully charming as the bogus princess and does some exceptionally fine emotional acting. E. H. Calvert, who directed the production, also assumes one of the chief roles and gives a very worthy character portrayal. Bryant Washburn, Thomas Commerford and Jane Paddock also do good work.

The story itself is vitally interesting and full of action, the only fault being that the opening is a little confusing and the average fan is liable to get the princess and her friend confused. The crises are well developed and the climax very distinct. The photography is exceptionally clear and steady.

A costume subject of this kind is very difficult to handle, for the slightest slip in the atmosphere is noticeable; but Director Calvert has watched every detail with great care and throughout the two thousand feet nothing appears to detract from the merit of the production.

At the opening of the first reel we learn that Francis, reigning prince of Hofgarten, wishes to unite his kingdom with that of the adjoining principality, Strelitzburg. He is at loss as to how to accomplish this until he recalls that his nephew Philip, the heir apparent to the throne, will soon be of age and that his marriage to the sister of Prince Frederick of the neighboring kingdom will solve the difficulty.

Philip has been attending school in Paris since he was a boy and his uncle has no idea of his appearance. Stella, the sister of Frederick has also been away from her brother since childhood, having been raised in a convent. Richard Savage of the U. S. A. has been in Paris for some time and has met Phillip, the two now being the closest friends.

Francis dispatches Count Karl, an under-secretary, to Philip with word that he must return at once and prepare for his marriage with the princess Stella. Philip, however, has fallen in love with a girl he has met in Paris and refuses to give up his love for her. He appeals to Savage to take his place, saying that after the ceremony Savage can disappear and that his uncle's wish will be granted. Savage is of adventurous nature and agrees to the plan. Count Karl, who had been a school mate of Philip's without knowing he was a prince, is taken into the plan and agrees to help Savage impersonate the real prince.

Prince Frederick, anxious to see the marriage performed as by it he will regain the state jewels which he has pawned, sends word to Princess Stella telling her to return to the kingdom and prepare to marry

Philip. Stella has had a love affair of her own while at school and refuses to give up the man of her affection for the unknown prince so she persuaded her friend Helen Churchill of Philadelphia to take her place, saying that she can disappear after the ceremony.

Savage and Helen, therefore, go to Francis and Frederick and are accepted as the real prince and princess. Their meeting proves a surprise to both, however, for the moment they see each other they fall in love. Each realizes that they are playing false and both believe the other to be of royal birth. Three officers of Frederick's court, who have been in close touch with Philip since his boyhood, see that Savage is not the real prince and plot to gain the two kingdoms for themselves by preventing the marriage.

Time passes and the day of the wedding approaches. Savage is injured while riding with Helen and as he lies unconscious she kisses him. He recovers and begs for her love but she tells him their marriage is to be one of convenience and that love cannot enter into it. And so the two of them are unhappy as both love each other but realize the great obstacle between them.

certain part of the castle. As he arrives there he is attacked by the three officers of the court, who attempt to make him a prisoner. The American proves their master, however, and with Count Karl's assistance locks the three officers up and returns to his room where he prepares for the wedding. In Paris Philip declares his love for the girl he believed was of low birth and when she learns that he is Prince Philip she happily tells him that she is Princess Stella. They realize that now there is no obstacle to their royal marriage and hurry to Strelitzburg.

Savage and Helen enter the throne room where the bishop waits to perform the ceremony. The three officers manage to escape and rush toward the room in which the ceremony is about to begin, arriving just before the bishop starts the services. They expose Savage and say that the marriage cannot take place. The real prince and princess arrive at this moment and declare their identity. Helen and Savage look at each other in happy surprise as both realize that the barrier between them has been removed and that they are free to love.

The two couples kneel before the bishop and the American and royal lovers are united at the same time. Mr. and Mrs. Savage then sail for their native land, leaving Prince Philip and Princess Stella to rule the united kingdoms of Hofgarten and Strelitzburg. The cast is as follows:

Richard Savage, U. S. A.....Francis X. Bushman
Helen Churchill of Philadelphia.....Beverly Bayne
Francis of Hofgarten .....Thomas Commerford
Philip, heir apparent to Hofgarten.....Bryant Washburn
Count Karl Von Blumm.....E. H. Calvert
Frederick of Strelitzburg .....Charles Hitchcock
Princess Stella .....Jane Paddock

Pleasing Variety at Vita Theater

The new bill at the Vitagraph theater offers a three-reel drama of tenseness in "The Painted World," a five-reel film of humorous situations in "A Florida Enchantment" and a cloud-like review of the various makes of aeroplanes as the new touch to the Battery scene which winks into view every night and serves as the "Window of the world" introduction to the showing of the theater's feature films.

"The Painted World" is the month's big offering. Written by Jacques Futrelle, picturized by Margaret Bertsch and featuring Julia Swayne Gordon, Anita Stewart and Harry Northup, it makes a film of rare dramatic value. Miss Gordon is at her best in the role of an actress-mother, whose love for her little girl is the one wonderful thing in her life. The little girl, played by Anita Stewart, loathes the perfumed embrace and the passionate kisses of the bejeweled woman. Miss Stewart fits well into the role of Yvette Murree, daughter of the actress and Harry Northup is deserving of credit for his portrayal of Murree, the girl's father.

There are scenes in the picture in which the dramatic verges into the gruesome; for instance, the laceration of the actress' eye in the scene with her intoxicated husband and later the scene in which the actress stabs her daughter to prevent her following in her footsteps. The sightless, scarred eye of Elois Murree has the emotions of the spectators at its mercy, throughout two reels. Ralph Ince is the director of this film and two other characters who appear to advantage in it are Janice Cummings, as maid to Elois and R. A. Roberts, theatrical manager.

"A Florida Enchantment" forms the latter part of the program and also the lighter part. It is presented by a large and competent cast in which Edith Story easily takes the stellar honors, although Sidney Drew is also seen to good advantage. The film was directed by Mr. Drew and tells a story of a young heiress who, because she believes her lover untrue, takes a capsule which is guaranteed to reverse the nature of all men and women. So the young heiress becomes the gay Mr. Lawrence and thereby situations both humorous and awkward follow each other into the fifth reel when the distracted heiress awakes to the thankful realization that she is still Lillian Travers, the heiress, and is ready to forgive her once-doubted fiance.

A. M. Galles, who is at present handling six copies of "The Littlest Rebel" in Illinois and Wisconsin, recently secured the state rights for Michigan, Indiana and Minnesota and is to receive four more prints of the film. Up to date he reports that he has secured more than $10,000 worth of bookings exclusive of the film which is being shown at the Studebaker Theater, Chicago.

DOROTHY PHILLIPS possesses a lofty beauty, emphasized by a pair of delightful, lustrous eyes, a well-moulded nose, and a mouth which breaks into a dimpling smile as the interpretation of the character she may be playing demands. It was her physical beauty that caused her to be chosen by Henry W. Savage for the part of Modesty in "Everywoman." Her previous experience on the stage was when she was playing in Fawcett stock company as a lead in "Mary Jones' Pa." Miss Phillips first entered the film game by way of the Essanay Company. She remained with that company for some time, with marked success. Then she returned to the stage to create the title role in "Pilate's Daughter," in which she toured a number of cities of New England. Following this she joined the Universal, and is now playing leads with Imp under Director Frank Crane.

WILLIAM SHAY is one of the oldest leads in any of the Universal companies in point of service. Affiliated with the Imp Company as lead for several years, he has endeared himself to the hearts of millions of screen fans. Mr. Shay was born and educated in New York City. Naturally gifted as a musician, and always a student of it, he went to Paris at an early age to study the piano. There he stayed for three years before he returned to enter the musical field. However, the stage got into his blood, and he soon was playing leads in a prominent stock company in the east. He remained in this field for two years, and then joined Mrs. Leslie Carter, with whom he played for ten years. The Imp Company discovered him and he has been with it for four years as leading man under the direction of Herbert Brenon. One of his best pictures is "Neptune's Daughter."

BOB LEONARD is a Universal Rex star, appearing in the pictures he helps to produce at the company's west coast studios. His stage career proper began eight years ago in Los Angeles, when he joined the chorus in the California Opera Company. He went to work for $15.00 a week with the ultimatum from his father that if he did not double his salary before the end of the first season, he must get out of the business. Before he left that company he became, all at the same time, comedian, assistant manager, stage manager, property man, and door keeper, and his salary was raised from $15.00 to $20.00 a week. Then he turned to light opera, and played important parts in various light opera and dramatic companies in California until three years ago when he was engaged by the Universal Pacific Coast company to play juvenile leads, and later became leading man in Otis Turner's company.

PAULINE BUSH, now leading woman in the Universal west coast Rex company, had never seen a screen play up to three years ago, and the first time she entered a motion picture theater was to see herself in her first part, in which she impersonated a rough western character. Miss Bush was born in Lincoln, Nebr., and graduated from the university of that state. She has played in stock in practically all the big cities of the West. Her first picture engagement was three years ago, with the American Company. From there she came to Universal more than a year ago. Since then she has appeared in many screen successes, and one of them in which she showed herself an artist of the highest type is "Richelieu," a four-reel feature. In her moments of recreation, Miss Bush indulges her taste for music, literature and art. She is also a great lover of horses.

Novel Publicity Stunt

The novel scheme of publicity in connection with the presentation of the Itala Film Company's production of D'Annunzio's "Cabiria" has been adopted by the manager of the Chicago company playing at the Illinois Theater. A large frame forty-two inches by eighty-four inches surrounds a lettered panel stating the exact number of admissions, the figures being changed at the close of each performance. A great deal of curiosity has been excited by this plan of advertising, particularly among the exhibitors of other attractions playing Chicago, who are eager to watch the progress of the "Cabiria" engagement and compare results with their own attractions.

Censorship Injunction Denied

The injunction suit brought by exhibitors in Philadelphia, Pa., in co-operation with the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and Mutual Film Corporation in regard to censorship in Pennsylvania has reached the stage of first decision; the three Common Pleas Court judges denying an injunction. They placed their reliance upon the decision in the Ohio case instituted by the Mutual Film Corporation.

The Ohio case has already been appealed to the United States Supreme Court and the Pennsylvania case will be taken at once to the Supreme Court of that state. Pending the appeal in the latter state satisfactory arrangements have been made for the continuance of business without serious interruption.

To Present "His Last Dollar"

An elaborate and spectacular film adaptation of the famous racing play, "His Last Dollar," with its author, David Higgins, in the role originally created by him, is now in the course of production by the Famous Players Film Company. The play is perhaps the most thrilling of its kind ever produced, and the success of the original production was so decisive and notable that the title of the play has become a by-word in racing circles, and for many years a "David Higgins" has been commonly accepted as representing the last dollar in one's possession.

The play, which has had an illustrious history, antithetical to its tender love element, also includes a series of sensational incidents and overpowering dramatic episodes, and the big race track climax is reached with scarcely a momentary relaxation of action.

The film version of the play gives a glimpse into the Kentucky home of Eleanor Downs, where ex-jockey Bracton introduces the villain Lison, who woos, wins and eventually loses Eleanor, and later proves the instrument of her father's financial ruin.

After the real stress of the story is developed and overcome, Bracton and Eleanor, between whom a mutual attachment has sprung up, and who win a signal victory over the common dangers that threatened, agree to finish life's race together, and the story terminates in a thoroughly happy manner.

The Famous Players is taking advantage of the spirited racing season now in progress at Saratoga, and has obtained permission from the racing association to take pictures of the race course from a number of different angles, which will materially increase the realistic powers of the film.

Gill in Glacier Park

Jack J. Gill.

Jack J. Gill, for the last eleven years in the motion picture game, recently found his way into Glacier National park, rubbed elbows with the Blackfeet braves, was adopted into the tribe, and succeeded in getting a few hundred feet of film in the nation's newest playground. Gill is now with the Hearst-Selig weekly and is jumping about the country making trips from coast to coast. He has been with Pathe, New York Motion Picture company, the American and Majestic. At present he is one of the regular operators on the weekly and has a big territory to comb for news events of international interest. In the photo Jack appears as though he were thinking longingly of dear old State street.

Boost for Eclectic Feature

The Eclectic Pathe American-made feature "The Last Volunteer," has been selected to open the splendid new Hammerstein Opera House at Lexington Avenue and 50th street, New York, on August 22. It will be remembered that this house was built for grand opera purposes exclusively, with a seating capacity of 3,500 and most luxurious appointments. Owing to the fact that Mr. Hammerstein has been enjoined from using the house for opera he has decided to devote it to the best feature films only. That "The Last Volunteer" has been chosen for the opening speaks strongly for the excellence of this fine picture. It will be shown for an entire week.

On the Outside Looking In

By the Goat Man

Nicholas Dunaew, new Vitagraph star.

A LITTLE while ago I told you that film men were forming the habit of breaking away from work and spending week-ends in the country. In earlier days you could find the film man you were looking for at any hour of the day. The days always overlapped the nights. They were extremely long and busy days. The change from the old to the new system of hours was never more apparent than right now. ¶One Saturday morning, only recently, I called at Universal headquarters in the Mecca building. They have an ex-police officer at the information desk who is also time keeper. He has a pink slip he hands you which suggests that you write your name, who you care to see and your business. There wasn't room on the slip for all the Universal folks I wanted to see so I ran the names off verbally and was told that Joe Brandt was in. It was a shame to intrude on Joe the day he got in from a two months' junket around the south. I knew that there was sickness in Joe's family and that his work must have piled up on him, but he would see me. I was ushered into Mr. Kahn's office where I found Joe doing Laemmle's secretary's work. From there Joe would assume Mr. Laemmle's office and from Laemmle's office he would proceed to Mr. Graham's quarters. In other words all the executives at Universal headquarters were off on week-end expeditions. Mr. Laemmle was up in the White Mountains. ¶Joe Brandt was the whole day works, neglecting his own affairs for the night shift. Joe had been booming the "Trey o'Hearts" and was happy with the success achieved. If some of us had a small portion of Joe's optimism and energy we'd be a lot better off. ¶I learned that Bob Cochrane had been away from the office for a month—playing golf at New Rochelle. Bob is the first film man golfer I've run across. I'll be tempted to carry my own tools, hereafter. J. Cecil Graham's family were abroad—I said good-bye to them on the Aquitania. I knew Mrs. Graham when she was little Daisy Stoddard at Republican City, Nebraska. It is a mere little world after all.

It would be an unfinished visit to the big Eastern metropolis to overlook Pat Powers, so I never do. That was where I filched the snap shot of Harry Warner that was printed in these pages last week. It was one of the stills that escaped Kirk! ¶I have shown you in pictures the offices of Warner's Features—a spacious, magnificent suite occupying a whole floor of the Leavitt building, off Broadway at 46th street. Everything is done in mahogany. It is interesting to note right here that the World Film Corporation suite in the same building has a floor almost identical with Warner's except it is in fumed oak and Eclair Film Company, in the same building, has a floor in all respects similar, but in golden oak. World and Eclair must have patterned after Warner's for Warner's went into the Leavitt building before it was finished. But they should also be complimented, for film offices such as these will be hard to improve upon. ¶I can always see P. A. Powers and my regret lies in not being able to print what I hear. Pat Powers is a student of the film industry and his interests in the business are large and strangely interwoven. I am sure he thoroughly enjoys his work and he should share the prosperity that follows close and intelligent application. I learned that Pat Powers and Carl Laemmle get on hand and glove as a special committee in charge of Universal exchanges and that the Powers-Laemmle litigation has developed to the point of a near-lawsuit. It was at the corner of Pat Powers' big mahogany desk that I discovered the special advantage of the independent, un-affiliated exchange men. There are several organizations for film distribution, with insufficient films to make a dependable, competitive program. There are legions of film makers with lack of capital or facilities, or both, to turn out good pictures in ample quantity or quality to supply these distributors. The lure of the near-feature has sadly demoralized the small film manufacturer. His meagre funds were tied up in the long-lengths about the time that a real definition of feature films became apparent. The feature market is based upon the full meaning of the feature film. Footage falls far short of satisfaction—as far short, in fact, as a large percentage of the films themselves. The New York condition suggests that some of the best of the little makers get together with the distribution factors and line up a complete program. ¶The day I visited with P. A., he traded in his old car for a new one and bought a choice bit of real estate in one of the exclusive suburban residence sections. He talks poverty in one breath and splashes the long green around in the next. Acceptances, notes, and I. O. U.'s are "tickets" in the vernacular of Powers. As a ticket vendor he is the wizard of the rialto.

Right down stairs you'll find Lewis J. Selznick with a life-sized idea or two of his own. This man Selznick has only recently disclosed his identity in the prints, but I've known him ever since he used to block up the aisles at the Universal offices. Before Selznick was in films, he found the jewelry business to his liking. He has made some marvelous strides in films. He has been in and out of Universal and Warner's. He is now the dominating spirit of the World Film Corporation. He recently asked whether exhibitors would be interested in a new program of twenty-eight reels of "the foremost American makers." He should have been overwhelmed with inquiry. It was a bit spectacular to make it so strong, however. The foremost American makers are pretty well taken care of through their own distribution schemes. What Lewis meant was the foremost unattached American makers!

I have already hinted that most of these straggling film makers are short of funds. They want to match their plants and ability to make films against brand new money and they parry every offering of the distributors. Out of it will come some solution, but having wasted the entire summer in a fruitless struggle to solve the problem, it is evident that time isn't deemed essential.

The organization of the Paramount Film Corporation was both timely and fortunate. If the affairs of this concern are wisely administered, exhibitors are assured a tremendous program of known merit. When I have attempted to see William Hodkinson, he was always in Los Angeles—a rummy place to hold out when you are supposed to be in a New York office! But I was all through the plan of the organization; know all the people from the office rail to Adolph Zukor and believe it is the nearest approach to program competition that has gone out of Greater New York this year.

Mentioning Adolph Zukor recalls a most pleasant hour with that gentleman in his office at the Famous Players studio and plant. When I called, Ben Schulberg told me that his chief was busy counting money (strictly not for publication stuff) and that I couldn't get in right away. At that, I roamed out into the studio and greeted Daniel Frohman. Everybody works at Famous Players, nowadays! Then I saw your film idol and mine, Mary Pickford. She wasn't dolled out in evening togs this time, but she held my hand again, even with Owen Moore for an audience. Mary was in the blare of the studio lights, that makes us all look the last stages of consumption and she was wearing the garb of a ragmuffin. I remember some burlap patches on her short skirt and there were great holes in her polka dot stockings. Her hair was tousled and her shirt waist was torn. Mary's make-up was superb and the hovel that sheltered her was equally well done. Together we inspected the place. It wasn't anything like the Jardin de Danse, believe me. Mary was alike in both places—habit or habitat counts for naught with her.

'A long time ago, as I recall it now, I tried to meet Mr. Zukor. A frivolous office employee told me that he rarely ever got down to his desk before eleven thirty and left for the day at one o'clock. My comment was that Mr. Zukor would never qualify for the film business on a schedule like that. I know now that the employee was over zealous in misstating the facts. Mr. Zukor, like other successful film men, is on the job almost constantly. He abandoned the idea of a private office remote from the studio and moved over among his workers. My praise of the man's achievements to date would sound rather hollow. We have come to know just what Famous Players brand means. We are safe in booking the entire product far in advance and sight-unseen. 'Ed Porter, the technical director of Famous Players films, had just returned from Europe the day I called at 213 West 26th street, and Ben Schulberg had some dopester's yarns to spin that were worth listening to so we had our luncheon together that day. If Ben wasn't such a modest, hard-working chap he'd let me have that story which concerned Ed Porter, Hugh Ford and the royal suite in Lunnon. Ben says nobody would believe it but that it is gospel truth. I heard it but it would be impossible for me to put it over.

There is no goo around the plant—developer is running low—to hear the maker rave and rant, there'll be no films for us to show. And carbons, too, are nearly out—we get 'em all across the sea—the operators raise the shout and are as sore as they can be. Gus Selig has two barrels of brine and every little dinky frill to keep the works a-running fine, but he is crying over Bill! In all the circle there is grief about the havoc war has wrought. If there's a chance to get relief, the time is ripe, as like as not. When chemicals and carbon sticks give way to schemes for better light and other stunts conceived by tricks, we'll wag along and feel alright. I hear it everywhere I go—to war is charged the woes of man—we're not to have our pic-

Original Mrs. Wiggs Secured

Blanche Chapman, who created the role of Mrs. Wiggs for the legitimate stage arrived recently in San Francisco for a special engagement with the California Motion Picture Corporation. This concern is now filming "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" and Mrs. Chapman is to take the title role. Alice Hegan Rice, author of the novel of that name and co-author of the play, was instrumental in securing Mrs. Chapman's services for the California Company. Mrs. Chapman had already signed a contract for the coming theatrical season but the California people bought her release for a period of sufficient length to complete their production. Mrs. Chapman herself welcomed the picture engagement since she is very partial to the part of Mrs. Wiggs.

The cast for the picture appears to be perfectly balanced. Miss Beatriz Michelena is being starred as Lovey Mary, House Peters is playing Mr. Bob and Andrew Robson is assaying the part of Mr. Wiggs.

Kleine War Pictures

The thirty-five hundred feet of war pictures, last week released by George Kleine, are creating a genuine stir throughout America. With their opening at Jones, Linick & Schaefer's, McVickers, Theater, Chicago, a flood of bookings were received from the bigger and better class of picture theaters in the western metropolis, who recognized the timely and money-making possibilities. This applies to all of the Kleine branch offices. The amazing response from theaters of all kinds kept the entire Kleine organization going at top speed night and day for the past week. Three days after the film had been announced all Kleine offices were booked solid up to the middle of October, necessitating the printing of many extra positives to take care of theaters that did not wish to wait eight weeks for dates.

The film shows important rulers and statesmen of the nations involved, the French Army in Action, Belgian Cavalry, Swiss Artillery Corps, Life in the h Navy, British Field Gun Evolution, German Artillery Corps in Action, Review of the Austrian Army by Archduke Francis Ferdinand whose assassination caused the war, and timely views of Servian and Montenegrin troops in action.

"Cabiria" Unaffected by War

War in Europe must have some effect on the motion picture business in America, but it will not interfere with the American tour of "Cabiria" although the great spectacle is the product of the Itala Films of Torino, Italy.

About a month ago, Harry R. Raver, who is directing the American tour of "Cabiria" realized the gravity of the European situation and cabled the Itala film company to make a hundred prints of the picture and ship them in at once. Mr. Raver received word a few days ago that the films had reached the United States Custom House; securing their release is only a matter of formality.

All the copies of "Cabiria" with their sub-titles, in well chosen English, are made in Italy. This is because many scenes are tinted and toned and the Itala Films feels its laboratory work is unexcelled. Further, many scenes show two colors applied by the Itala process which has not yet been exploited in this country, and special equipment is required.

"Beloved Adventurer" Lubin's First Serial

The Lubin Company has announced for release, beginning September 14, and Monday of each week thereafter, a fifteen part serial of single-reel romances unique in several particulars and destined to set a new standard for installment stories. Arthur V. Johnson and Lottie Briscoe are featured in the series, and are supported by fifteen separate casts.

Under the general title "The Beloved Adventurer" there are fifteen separate stories, each complete in itself, yet, when taken in sequence, the entire fifteen co-ordinate to form a continuous narrative or master-story with a main theme of unusual interest and strength. Should it happen that a patron miss one or two reels, there would be no bewildering break, the composition being so carefully and skillfully worked out that the main theme is picked up from a logical beginning with each new reel, without tiresome repetition. Romance, humor, tragedy, adventure and pathos are found in the stories.

Primarily, the "Beloved Adventurer" is a character study, written with particular regard to the characteristics and peculiar abilities of Mr. Johnson, who plays the part of Lord Cecil, an impoverished nobleman of unique and appealing qualities. That Emmett Campbell Hall, the author of this series, has a particularly happy faculty for presenting Mr. Johnson with exceptionally good opportunities for demonstrating his special talents has been shown in a number of successful plays, but, in order that he might make this series a practically perfect vehicle, Mr. Hall, before starting the work, caused to be run in one of the private projecting rooms at the studio every one of the many Lubin films in which Mr. Johnson has appeared, making a fair sized volume of notes, and supplementing this with numerous consultations with the actor-director.

Any possibility of sameness or monotony in the reels is eliminated not only by the fact that each has a distinctive and original plot, but by the strongly contrasting atmosphere and environments. These include high English society; the American newly-rich; the clever half-world; raw Western mining camps, and the sea. No pains, time or expense have been spared in this production, the Lubin Company being determined that its initial serial should command only the most favorable criticism from every point of view.

Coincident with the release of "The Beloved Adventurer" as a photoplay, the complete story will be published in book form, this being an entirely new idea and one which will commend itself to the exhibitor no less than to the public. Emmett Campbell Hall is also the author of this novel, which would take high rank as popular literature aside from its connection with the pictures. It is a handsome volume in full cloth binding of vellum de luxe cloth, with fifteen full-page illustrations consisting of half-tone portraits of the leading photoplayers appearing in the series and scenes from the plays. It will be supplied to exhibitors at a very low price and its sale will be a source of direct profit as well as serving to greatly stimulate interest in the pictures.

Ramo in New Studio

This week will find the Ramo Company in its new studio at Flushing, Long Island. Before leaving the old studio at 102 West One Hundred and First street Mr. Cobb realized the uselessness of keeping a stock company for feature work and consequently advised the elimination of all stock employees. George Gebhart was retained as director, as well as John Arnold, camera expert. The balance of the company were either let out or allowed to resign. In all future features new faces will be used and only the highest class of professionals will appear.

Opens Minneapolis Branch

The Milwaukee Poster Mounting Company, Manhattan building, Milwaukee, announces the opening of a branch office in Minneapolis. Business from that section of the country warranted the move. The Minneapolis, Minnesota, branch is located at 252 First avenue North, where a plant covering almost an entire floor has been installed. John Delorenzo of the above firm will look after the Minneapolis branch, while his brother Frank will maintain charge of the main office in Milwaukee.

Jack and His Car

Jack Richardson is getting along famously with his new auto. Last week he managed to get through the entrance of the grounds without carrying the gates off the hinges. However, his machine got unruly when once within the grounds. It seemed to shy at "Spot," the canine mascot of the "Flying A," and took to the long grass. After some moments of hesitation on the part of the driver, he calmly reversed the lever and got back to the walk without serious damage to the well kept grounds.

Variety Marks Edison Releases

Acting Good in All

LOUIS JOSEPH VANCE'S story, "Sheep's Clothing," has been filmed by the Edison company and will be released on September 18. The plot is substantial and deep enough to keep the action purposeful throughout the two reels, and the background could hardly have been selected with better results for creating the proper atmosphere.

One of the dramatic points which might have been emphasized a little stronger is where the young daughter, returning from boarding school, learns that her father is a member of a band of smugglers and steamer sharps. This, however, is but a small item compared with the successful staging of the rest of the production. The interpretation of the characters is exceptionally fine, and the players were cast with an idea of fitting the characters rather than the reverse. Gertrude McCoy's girlish appearance and dutiful obedience are qualities which one would naturally attribute to Lydia Craven whose entire time, practically, has been spent at a school away from home, while the mere mention or description of the other characters would suggest such a type as Bigelow Cooper for the role of Thaddeus Craven, the card sharp, or Edward Earle as the attractive, smooth young confederate, Peter Traft. The other roles, not quite as prominent but equally vital in their places, are given full justice in their impersonations by other popular Edisonites.

The action in the first of the picture takes place twenty years or so before the remainder of the story. After his wife's death Thaddeus Craven becomes a member of a gang of card sharps operating on the ocean liners and sends his little daughter, Lydia, to a boarding school in England. The second period of the story opens on a scene in which the now grown-up Lydia is quarreling with the mistress of the school. To escape further persecution at that person's hands, for the mistress wants Lydia to marry her nephew, the young girl runs away and books passage on a steamer bound for New York, as she thinks that is the permanent residence of her father. To her surprise she meets him on the boat. Her meeting with the rest of the gang is unavoidable.

One of the women, a noted smuggler, decides to reform and announces her intention of declaring her new diamond necklace on arriving in port. At her request Craven brings it up from the safe, but in returning with it substitutes a paste duplicate in its place.

Edison's "An Absent Minded Cupid" contains this scene.

Craven conceives the idea of escaping duty on the jewels by having his daughter smuggle them into port, telling her that he is on a secret mission for the British government and that the small package contains valuable information which must, by all means, be kept secret.

Arriving at shore the customs officer informs Miss Merrilees that the jewels presented for inspection are but paste. She is nearly overcome by the discovery that she has been so badly fooled, but the rest of the gang think it quite a joke. Knowing that his daughter suspects him of the theft, Craven thinks to deceive her by sending her to one of his friends with a note, after delivering which she is to return the necklace to Miss Merrilees. On the way an accident happens to delay her and Lydia delivers the jewels first. The note to Craven's friend asks that Lydia be detained until his arrival. When he learns from his daughter of how she has miscarried his instructions Craven becomes angry, and hurries back to his hotel, leaving Lydia to follow.

On board ship Peter Traft has taken a great liking to Craven's daughter, and after landing continues his attentions. It happens that he meets Lydia while on her way to deliver the note for her father and waits for her outside. They return to the hotel together and there find Craven dead, the victim of some of his former companions who have sworn revenge because of his deserting them. The discovery is a great shock to Lydia and causes a long and severe illness. On her recovery Traft proposes to her, and is accepted.

"AN ABSENT-MINDED CUPID" is an attractive story woven about the proverbial absent-minded professor who looks for the spectacles reposing on his forehead, attempts to manipulate his soup with his fork, and always forgets his hat, busily reading all the time.

The comedy is in one reel, featuring William Wadsworth. It will be released by the Edison company on September 7.

Bookley's thoughtlessness reflects misery on an outsider, however, when he allows the waiter in a restaurant to help him on with the coat which belongs to the young man dining with his sweetheart at the next table, and who has placed all his money in the pocket of his overcoat.

Dinner ended, the young couple are placed in an embarrassing position by the young man's being unable to find his overcoat and pay the bill. As fate would have it, a rival seated at a near-by table offers his assistance to the young lady and pays her bill leaving her lover stranded without coat or money, and bothered by the insistent demands of the management to pay his debt.

Some distance from the restaurant Mr. Bookley discovers that he is wearing an overcoat, hurries back, and arrives just after the young fellow had been thrown out. While he is explaining the mistake the young lover enters, receives his overcoat, and pays his bill, but is in no way recompensed for having lost out in his suit.

Sorry to have been the cause of the trouble Bookley visits the store in which the young people are employed and he and the manager invent a scheme by which the clerk will be reinstated in his sweetheart's affection. The young fellow is openely accused of being lazy and neglectful. The first to come to his defense is the girl who has refused to speak to him since the affair at the restaurant. When Bookley and the manager burst out laughing the young couple realize that it is merely a joke, and when the others obligingly turn their backs they "make-up" formally.

DREAMS have helped many pictures get over that, without the visionary scenes, would have been utter impossibilities. The Edison company has obtained all the dream benefit in "Dick Potter's Wife," by calling the production a modern fairy tale and employing a witch's supernatural powers to bridge over certain difficulties.

Herbert Prior's part as Dick Potter, the big, clean-cut business man, is one of the best characters in which he has appeared for some time. Gertrude McCoy is seen to good advantage as his wife, which part is also taken by the vivacious little Leonie Flugruth. Mathilde Baring characterizes Miss Sharpe, the governess so greatly interested in Potter's comfort.

September 12 is the release date of the picture which is in one reel.

Dick Potter's greatest comfort in the evening consists of smoking and reading, with his feet resting on whatever happens to be handiest, whether it be a finely polished chair or an immaculate bed-spread. Mrs. Potter is naturally nervous and worries a great deal about her husband's carelessness. He becomes impatient at being followed about his own house to see that he does not muss anything, and spends the next three or four evenings at the club, where he can relax after the day's grind without concerning anyone.

During his absence the fact dawns on his wife that maybe she is growing old and cross, and she visits a gypsy in search of something to restore her youth. She drinks the potion given her and is transformed into a child. Potter is puzzled by the appearance of the child and the disappearance of his wife. The little girl insists that she is his wife but he laughs at her ridiculous statements and employs a governess to take care of her. The little girl fears that the governess will usurp her place as Potter's wife and again seeks the gypsy, this time to be restored to her former size and appearance. Potter is agreeably surprised one night on returning from work to be greeted by his wife, now fresh appearing and without any tell-tale frown on her forehead. The governess is dismissed and the Potters start anew with a "don't worry" motto.

Potter's wife consults the fortune teller.

Ramo Managers Meet

The managers of the offices of Ramo Films, Inc., assembled at the office of C. Lang Cobb, Jr., in New York on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday of this week to discuss the general film situation and lay out a campaign for the handling of the big war picture series being placed on the market now by the company. Several changes have been made, among which are the following:

Joseph F. Lee was appointed special traveling representative and will devote the majority of his time for the present to the larger bookings of "The War of Wars." C. A. Maddox of Kansas City and William Conn of Minneapolis were dropped from the pay roll.

Frank W. Foster was returned to the Montreal offices and John S. Egan was placed in charge of the entire Canadian business, with headquarters at 11 Richmond street, West, Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

P. J. Hall was retained as district manager of the Minneapolis, Des Moines and Kansas City offices, with headquarters in the Utica building, Des Moines, Iowa. J. E. Conliff succeeded Mr. Lee at the Atlanta offices.

Two new managers will be appointed for the Minneapolis and Kansas City offices. All returned to their offices very much pleased with their trip, some increases in salaries and all enthusiastic over the Ramo big production entitled "The War of Wars."

WAR FEATURES

If supply were always an indication of demand—which it is not—we might be justified in assuming that the American people had gone as war-mad as any European. Look over any list of so-called feature films announced for early release and you will find an astonishing preponderance of war dramas. Some of these run to five or six reels, a considerable portion of which, it is to be presumed, presents in blood curdling verisimilitude the horrors and glories of the battlefield.

Now we have not observed that any of these impending releases pretend to be scenes from the present European war. Most of them are studio and field productions pure and simple, although some use may be made of previously taken sham battles, military maneuvers, and even minor engagements of recent history. At any rate, whatever they are, they are presented not as topicals in any sense, but as stories of war, for war's sake; that is, for the sake of the world-wide interest in warfare which the European embroilment has aroused.

That interest, no question about it, is intense just now. The fact that very little real news is coming through from the seat of war stimulates rather than lessens this feeling. People with war features to dispose of will very likely reap a harvest if they make hay while the sun shines.

But in the midst of this furore about war pictures, it is well to remember that before very long our war correspondent cameramen will begin to slip through the lines with the first actual war topicals—the picture records of the world's greatest disagreement. Whether there will be much or little of this real war film we cannot say just now. It is a case where the material is exceedingly plentiful and the opportunities for taking it exceedingly few. How many camera men will succeed in getting passports and permission, or in getting pictures without permission, cannot be estimated. But whether it be much or little, it is bound to transcend in popular interest any studio war drama or any drama at all for that matter, that was ever secured. If there should be much of it, the studio war drama will be forced off the boards. If there should be but little of it, the make-believe war pictures will find it hard—almost impossible—competition.

Such war pictures need not, of course, have any bearing on or any relation to the European war. In their present state of mind, and the present dearth of real news, the people will pay to see any picture that says war. But, nevertheless, conscientious producers, for their own sake as well as that of the public, will probably see to it that these war pictures, if not authentically topical, are at least accurate and reliable in their representation of military usages. If we can depend upon the miscellaneous war dramas for some instructional value besides the entertainment they provide, their production will not have been in vain.

CARRYING ON THE OLD FIGHT.

WILLIAM FOX, one of the most strenuous antagonists of the well-known system referred to by him as "the Trust," has come out with a circular calling upon motion picture men to get together. His special plea is for the organization of a board of trade to represent the interests of the independents. We italicize the word because it is the first time we have seen it for quite a while. We may be wrong, but we had gathered the impression that motion picture men had practically abandoned the use of the terms "licensed" and "independent," except in a historic sense. Certainly there is little occasion to use them in the existing amicable condition.

The circular mentioned presents two occasions for a board of trade: To watch anti-trust legislation (the Clayton bill specifically), and the suit of the federal government against the "motion picture trust." The two reasons appear to be but one, and that one an attempt to keep alive a sort of guerilla warfare that has already done harm in many branches of business.

We are not attempting apology or condonement for any of the dark deeds popularly charged against big business combinations in any line. Defense of a patent right, of course, is not included in this category; for there would be no value in a patent if it could not be protected. But it is quite apparent that if every industry was forced to bear the brunt of continuous attack the business situation would be intolerable.

Those who view with favor Mr. Fox's plan of organization are asked to contribute ten dollars to create a fund to carry on the work. That is entirely proper, of course; money is required to carry on any work. But we have been pleading so long for a single organization of motion picture interests, and that desirable condition seems so near consummation, that we cannot look with approval upon any scheme calculated to divert the attention and the membership fees of exhibitors from the main purpose.

The powerful association which will result from the pending amalgamation of existing bodies will take care of all such matters as the circular mentions, and needs all the support it can get from exhibitors, from the trade in general, and from Mr. Fox himself.

AMALGAMATION EFFORTS

A brief article on another page, entitled "New York Tries Amalgamation," indicates that the New York state and local exhibitors' organizations, with the best intentions in the world, are having a hard time developing that single association which practically all have admitted is the only logical condition. The difficulty just now seems to be the unwillingness of the state president to resign his office pending the reorganization.

It appears superfluous to point out at this time that the good of all is very apt to demand the sacrifice of some few, and that those few should be more than willing to efface themselves temporarily for the sake of so great a benefit as a single harmonious organization. We say "temporarily" in the belief that those who are now in power are good men for the place; and good men anywhere are too scarce to be lost sight of. Every man who has any organizing ability will surely find an outlet for his talent once the single association is established.

In any event, the majority rules; and the majority is unequivocally and enthusiastically in favor of amalgamation. Those few who still oppose the idea had best subdue the tendency and accept progress with as good grace as possible. For amalgamation is almost accomplished, and before long all the worth-while exhibitors will be brother members of a single society.

Just A Moment Please

Guess we'll have to take our hats off to Universal, fellers. The war in Europe began on or about August 1 and the "Universal notes" received on August 13 contain this line:

Francis Ford and Grace Cunard are putting on a four-reel German-French photoplay with war as a central interest.

Guess that's going some.

And probably this is only the beginning of the slaughter which is scheduled for the screen during the coming months.

Odds of ten to seven are offered that General Pritzloff, the German commander, has an ex-film press agent. Newspaper dispatches of August 14 declare that General Pritzloff was struck by an exploding shell while near the city of Longwy, but that he "escaped without injury and insisted on continuing in the battle."

Mystery Film Has Powerful Climax

Twelfth Juror Confesses

A CLEVER mystery play which reaches its climax in a big, convincing court room scene is the release of the Selig Polyscope Company for August 31 entitled "Who Killed George Graves?"

Olga tells John she cannot marry him.

The plot of the story centers around two events; the building up of the mystery atmosphere surrounding the murder and the dramatic trial of the man who has been falsely accused, but these are tightly woven together by several connecting incidents, the whole forming a compact and charming narrative.

While the early development at times becomes a little obvious for a mystery story but the latter part is cleverly arranged and it is certain to keep the picture patrons keyed up to the highest pitch until it has faded from the screen. The production has been carefully staged and great credit is due Director Le Saint for the correct detail in the jail and court room scenes.

The cast, headed by Stella Razeto and Guy Oliver, do excellent work throughout, the courtroom scene being an excellent example of the handling of a trying dramatic situation by silent acting. Miss Razeto is given a chance to display her talent for emotional acting and her work is very meritorious while Mr. Oliver gives a perfect characterization of a strong man forced to bow before the law.

While the court room set is not as large as some which have appeared on the screen it is carefully arranged and the constant switching of the camera gives the impression that it is of large dimensions. The other scenes, most of which are interiors, are well set and artistically photographed, the scenes taken in a candy store being especially worthy of mention on account of their natural appearance.

The story opens with the triumph of Olga North on the stage. She has slowly advanced from the ranks of the chorus and now she heads her own company and is an idol of the public. John Borne, a wealthy broker, meets and falls in love with her and she apparently returns his affection but tells him they cannot marry as there is an obstacle in the way. The young man is puzzled and writes her, asking an explanation and saying that if it is merely her stage career he will put nothing in her way.

Olga gets his letter and writes him saying that the obstacle she spoke of does not pertain to her work but that she married a man named George Graves many years before and he proved worthless and deserted her. She says that she has never seen or heard of him since that time. John is heartbroken at the receipt of the letter but determines that his love shall not die and that he shall ever be near Olga, ready to protect her.

The verdict of the jury.

George Graves, now a member of a gang living in the slums, accidentally learns that Olga North, the famous actress, is the wife he had deserted and sees the possibility of a steady income without working so he goes to her apartments and tells her that she will have to give him money at regular intervals or he will let the public know he is her husband.

Olga gives him the money and asks him if he will agree not to contest a divorce suit if she pays him $500. Graves sees a chance to make even more money and agrees to the plan.

The following day Graves again comes to Olga's apartment and, after receiving the money, signs the paper agreeing to go away and never return. The actress hears John coming before her husband can leave and hurries the worthless man into a side room. John comes in and notices that Olga is acting queerly. When he questions her she tells him that Graves is in the next room. John is angry to think that the brute should annoy the woman he loves and, when Olga discovers that Graves has taken the paper giving her freedom to her, he rushes into the next room to secure it.

Olga follows a moment later and is horrified when she sees John bending over the body of her dead husband, his head buried in his hands. At the side of the murdered man lies a knife, covered with blood. Olga's maid enters at this moment and calls the owner of the building and he in turn notifies the police. There can be but one solution to the death of the man of the underworld and John is arrested and put in jail to await his trial.

Time passes and the day of the trial approaches. The names for the jury are drawn at random from the city directory. Olga discovers that the money she gave to her husband, together with the paper he took, have disappeared and is about to expose her secret in order to free John but at his request to say nothing about it she remains silent.

The morning of the trial finds the court room crowded but the jury box still lacks one man. The twelfth juror is drawn and the lot falls upon Sykes, a confectioner and by his apparent knowledge of the law he becomes the foreman. The trial proceeds and John stoutly declares his innocence and says that he found the man dead upon entering the room. The fact that the owner of the apartment found John and Olga together with the lifeless form, however, seems proof that the man was killed by Borne. Olga realizes she can clear John's name by exposing herself, but the prisoner shakes his head and then, as she realizes how terrible it all is, the actress faints.

The testimony finished, the jury is locked up and Sykes argues for the conviction of the man. The other do not agree at first but soon all are convinced by the foreman that John killed Graves, so they return to the court room to give the verdict. The Judge rises to tell John of his fate when suddenly Sykes screams in terror. In place of the judge he sees the form of George Graves pointing an accusing finger at him.

He has always been troubled with a weak heart and now, with the sudden shock of his hallucination, he falls into the arms of the jurors, dying. He is laid upon one of the desks and just before he passes away he confesses that he was one of Graves' pals in the underworld and that, when he learned the other man was to receive the $500, he trailed him to the apartment and killed him, and with the money bought the candy store.

In Sykes' pocket is found the note saying that Graves will go away from Olga and not contest the divorce. The paper is destroyed by Borne and the last barrier in the path of his marriage to Olga is removed.

The cast is as follows:

Olga North	Stella Razeto
John Borne	Guy Oliver
George Graves	Mr. McCullough
William Sykes	Fred Huntly

New York Tries Amalgamation

At a recent meeting of the executive board of the Motion Picture Exhibitor's Association of New York state there were present Samuel H. Trigger, president; William A. Douque, secretary; W. H. Linton, treasurer; B. E. Cornell, John F. Miller, L. C. Smith, Max Samuels, and H. W. Rosenthal. There were also present Messrs. A. Bauernfreund, A. A. Corn, Grant W. Anson, William Hilkemeier, S. P. Weissman, Tobias A. Keppler, Maurice Fleischman, Deegan, Harris and Feinblatt, the latter five gentlemen representing the amalgamation committee of the Cinema Club, representing New York Local No. 1, of the M. P. E. L. of A.

Following a discussion as to the best means of amalgamation Mr. Douque moved that a resolution be drawn suggesting the best means of amalgamation which was seconded by Mr. Miller.

L. C. Smith made a motion to the effect that

Whereas, The resolution passed at the Dayton convention evidenced the desire of all motion picture exhibitors in the United States of having only one national organization, now,

Therefore, To consummate that purpose the state organization of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of N. Y., herewith tenders the resignation of all its officers to become effective only after there is but one state organization. The members of the state organization of the International Association are willing to attend a special meeting of the state organization of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, the program of which shall only be as follows:

The meeting to be opened by the state chairman; a committee to be appointed, two from the exhibitors' league and two from the Motion Picture Association, this committee to pass upon the qualifications of the representatives permitted to participate in the meeting. The representation to be upon the basis of the Ohio state constitution of the M. P. E. L. of A. After the qualification of the delegates have been passed upon the following resolution is to be offered—

Whereas, It is the intention of all exhibitors in the State of New York to have but one state organization, now, therefore,

Be It Resolved, That the members of such state organization shall consist of the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the State of New York. That the resignations of all officers of both the League and the Association shall then be tendered and accepted and a new election held.

This motion was seconded by Mr. Linton and carried unanimously. Mr. Miller, seconded by Mr. Linton, offered a resolution that,

Whereas, T. A. Keppler, representing John J. Wittman, president of the New York Local of the New York State League, having telephoned to the president of the State League, A. N. Wolff, that representatives of ninety percent of the State exhibitors being present and showing a desire to get together, and

Whereas, Mr. Wolff distinctly refused to call a meeting for that purpose and lend his good offices to assist in becoming one large body, therefore,

Be It Resolved, That the motion be carried and the amendment placed on the minutes and forwarded to the president of the National League. This resolution was carried unanimously.

L. C. Smith moved that a letter be sent to national president Pearce stating what had been done and also a copy of the letter be sent to Mr. Wolff, president of the state organization, stating the suggestions for amalgamation. This motion was seconded by Mr. Linton and carried.

War and Detective Films by Eclectic

Battle Scenes Realistic

ONE of the latest multiple war dramas and one which will find its level in the first row is a five part Pathe made feature, "The Last Volunteer," which is being distributed by the Eclectic Film Company.

The revolving of the nation stirring events about the simple romance which springs up between a young monarch, who sheds his sovereignty for a few days to enjoy the unconventionality of the world, and a peasant girl, whom he meets while traveling incognito, give it a human interest touch to this drama without detracting in the least from the strength of the issues involved.

Eleanor Woodruff and Irving Cummings share the leading roles, the former as Katrina, the wholesome, unselfish daughter of the innkeeper, Hermann Ardelheim (E. C. Hoyt), and the latter in the role of Prince Ludwig, the young ruler of Saxe-Tholberg. Robert Broderick also has one of the principal roles, appearing as Von Tromp, the marshal. Paul Panzer's role of ambassador of Austrania brings him on the screen but twice. Harold Crane plays the part of

The meeting of Prince Ludwig and Katrina.

Katrina's brother, Raolf, and Mary Gray plays her mother.

The battle scenes are especially worthy of mention. While but a small number of men are engaged they are so well handled that the usual supers' awkwardness, aimless firing and scattering is entirely eliminated and one gets the effect of an important battle raging between two well-trained armies. The photography is excellent and is much improved by the coloring in the final battle scene, showing a hand-to-hand struggle at the ramparts.

In the first scene Prince Ludwig is seen gazing longingly out of the castle window. In the valley beneath him there is a flock of sheep grazing, and to one side a little boy is seen lying in the grass, without a care in the world and free to do as he pleases.

The young ruler is bored by the continued pomp and luxury of the castle and decides to enjoy the relaxation of the outside world. He wanders through the woods and meets the daughter of the owner of a nearby inn. Attracted by the girl's beauty, Ludwig puts up at her father's inn, and spends much of his time roaming through the woods with Katrina.

Saxe-Tholberg is threatened with war by Austrania and couriers are dispatched to find the missing king. Ludwig is discovered at the inn and Katrina is heart-broken to learn that her lover is a member of the nobility and therefore unable to marry her, a peasant girl. Shortly after the prince's leaving, a mysterious guest comes to the inn and is visited by a man with whom he holds a secret conference in one of the rooms. Katrina spies on them and learns that they are Austranians. She tells her brother, a soldier, and he attempts to capture them at point of gun. In the struggle which follows Katrina seizes the gun, is attacked by one of the men, and shoots him. The dead man proves to be the Austranian ambassador.

Marshal Von Tromp arrests Katrina's brother Raolf despite the fact that the girl claims to have fired the shot. The Austranian government demands the immediate execution of the diplomat's murderer, threatening war in case of delay. As Raolf is being prepared for death by the chaplain Katrina pleads with Ludwig for her brother's life, but without success. Enraged by the injustice of the affair Katrina rebukes the ruler and his counselors for their lack of feeling and declares that she killed the ambassador in self-defense. Unheeding the advice of his counselors Ludwig pardons Raolf and precipitates the country into war with Austrania.

The decisive battle of the war is fought near the Ardelheim inn. The vital moment is reached when all that is necessary to completely demoralize the Austranian force is the advance of a distant regiment upon their right flank. Several times soldiers attempt to raise the signal ordering the advance but each time become the victims of the sharpshooters' deadly fire. Knowing that she was the cause of the war Katrina nobly offers to sacrifice herself in its cause, rushes out to the flag standard and raises the signal. She is carried back to the house mortally wounded and dies soon after Ludwig's arrival.

NICK WINTER is at all times a wonderful detective but seldom so sober-faced and serious as he proves to be in the late Eclectic three reel feature, "Nick Winter and the Lost Prince."

One of Nick Winter's hobbies is disguises and in this picture he spends most of his time in one, and an exceptionally good one, too. In Helene Dubois, the proprietress of the Hotel Beauville, he finds a woman whose skill and resourcefulness is well worth combating. The hotel, especially, is worthy the detective's attention as it contains suites of the most surprising kinds of furnishings; stationary trunks which are nothing more than entrances to secret passages; and chairs with movable seats, in the bottom of which a man could conceal himself. The cellar of the hotel, built on the ruins of an old castle, is so equipped that it can be turned into a prison at a moment's notice should the management desire to detain anyone.

The court is worried by the absence of the prince.

Prince Alexis visits in one of the provinces of Granovia under the name of H. Leslie. He meets and falls in love with Cecile Dubois, and a short time afterward disappears. Cecile receives a note from her lover stating that "H. Leslie" is only an assumed name and that the death of his father, the king, necessitates his leaving to take charge of the government affairs. Also that now being a king, he will be expected to marry a member of the nobility.

Cecile is grief-stricken and calls on her sister for help. The result is that Alexis pays a visit to Helene Dubois' Hotel Beauville in answer to an urgent plea from Cecile and is there made a prisoner. The grand duke becomes worried about Alexis' prolonged absence and employs Nick Winter to find him. The detective's clues lead him to Hotel Beauville, and a short time later he again visits the hotel but this time disguised as the grand duke.

Helene lays a trap for their titled guest and is overjoyed a few days later when the grand duke consents to sign a statement permitting Alexis to marry Cecile. The party, including Alexis, Cecile, and Helene, return to the castle where a big surprise is in store for the girls. Here they meet the real grand duke, and realize that they have been badly fooled.

The girls are imprisoned for their trickery. Alexis learns of it, and commissions Nick Winter to effect their escape. This he does, chiefly by means of another of his disguises, and the Dubois sisters return deeply impressed by Alexis' generosity and sincerely regretting the trouble they have caused him.

"After the Ball"

On Tuesday afternoon, August 18, James Maher, representing the Photodrama Company, producers of Charles K. Harris' success "After the Ball," gave a private showing of that six-reel feature to a specially invited gathering of feature buyers, exchange managers and representatives of the trade journals, at Fulton's exhibition room on LaSalle and Lake streets, Chicago.

The six-reel production of "After the Ball" is billed as "a drama of thrills, tears and heart throbs" and in many respects fully lives up to the billing. Thrills galore are offered in the spectacular chase scenes following the attack of the police upon a band of thieves, and one sees a leap for life from the top of the high bridge in New York City, a thrilling motor cycle chase after a flying express train, the leap of a motorcycle cop from his wheel to the steps of the express train, the jump of the pursued man from the train into the river many feet below, and other hair-raising feats. Tears will be brought to the eyes of many by the excellent playing of Herbert Kelcey in the role of John Dale, as he tells the story of what happened "after the ball" to his little niece. Heart throbs a-plenty are provided by the pathetic story of the lovers separated through a misunderstanding which a few words would have fully explained.

Herbert Kelcey and Effie Shannon are the two stars featured in the production and the work of both is excellent throughout. The supporting company is fully adequate to the roles assigned. Special mention ought to be made of the decidedly unusual scene in which Broadway is shown at midnight, with its thousands of flashing electric signs, and the glitter of the myriad autos that pass with their gay parties. This scene has seldom been equaled on the screen and probably never surpassed.

Commercial Company Busy

The laboratory of the Commercial Motion Pictures Company at Grantwood, N. J., is now working on double shifts of eight hours each in order to catch up to the large amount of orders on hand. Edward M. Roskam, the president of the company, is now dividing his time between the studio and the executive offices of the company in the city.

Makes Thrilling Leap From Ship

"Million Dollar Mystery"

FLORENCE LA BADIE, the charming heroine of Thanhouser's "The Million Dollar Mystery," demonstrates, in the ninth episode of that series which was released August 11, that she is not only a finished actress but also one of the most daring young women appearing before the camera, when she leaps from the deck of an ocean liner into the sea.

Not content with putting one thrill into the picture Miss La Badie is shown battling waves, which are real waves, in several scenes after the big leap. These two reels required a great deal of pluck on the part of the actress and the fearless manner in which she goes about her tasks is certain to win her the admiration of countless "fans."

The story itself takes an important step in its development in this episode as, at the close, we leave Florence stranded on a little isle with only the fisherfolk as companions and her mind a blank. The first reel is a little slow in getting started but the latter part of it and the entire second part is filled with action and is certain to hold the interest throughout.

The acting is up to the usual standard of the cast and most of the interior settings are those which have been used before. The scenes taken upon the ocean, both on the deck of the ship and in the cabins are well photographed and the pictures of the fishing boat are very realistic. The atmosphere of the little village of the fisherfolk on the island is splendid.

Frank Farrington registers several strong facial expressions in interpreting the plot to place Florence in the insane asylum and though this is but a developing incident it stands out prominently and will undoubtedly prove very appealing to the motion picture patrons.

The opening scene of this installment, which is entitled "The Leap from an Ocean Liner" shows Florence unwrapping a package which Jim, her reporter-sweetheart has sent her in an attempt to right the mistake he made in the previous installment when he allowed the countess to lure him into a compromising situation. Florence loves Jim and when she finds her ring in the package she slips it on her finger again.

In the rooms of the countess another plot to secure possession of the heiress is being laid. Braine and Olga being responsible for this one. With the aid of two more conspirators, one of them a woman of the underworld named Kate and the other her pal, they get in touch with a crooked doctor and hire him to give them a medical certificate showing that Florence is insane and that she has been assigned to the care of Kate and her pal.

Having thus protected themselves from the interference of the law the conspirators now plan to kidnap Florence and at the countess' suggestion they decide to ship her to Russia when they have secured her. This, they believe will get her out of the way for some time and they will be free to proceed with their work of securing the fortune.

All get into the countess' automobile and go to the Gray mansion where they hide the car in a protected part of the drive and wait for Florence to leave her home. It is not long before the heiress and her friend Susan come from within and drive away in their car to do some shopping at the stores in the city. The conspirators follow them through the busy streets until they arrive at their first stopping place.

Susan gets out of the car first and goes into the store, thinking that Florence is following right behind her. The conspirators, however, seize the heiress and are about to rush her into their auto when a policeman stops them. The certificate they secured now comes in handy and when they show it to the officer of the law and explain to him that Florence is in their keeping and that she tried to escape from them he helps them place her in their auto, despite her protests.

Susan misses Florence as soon as she gets into the store and hurries out to find her, just as the policeman is about to go away. She questions him and learns what has happened and, becoming excited, rushes to the nearest telephone booth and calls the Gray residence. Jim arrives at Florence's home about the same time and Jones, who answers the phone, that telephoned when he gets on the wire and they are forced to remain at the house until Susan arrives.

This gives the conspirators a chance to get Florence safely aboard a huge ocean liner and the ship pulls out to sea with the friends of the heiress still in doubt as to what has become of her. On board the vessel the girl tries to explain what has happened to the other passengers but none of them will believe her when Kate and her pal produce the certificate proving that she is insane.

The ship leaves the harbor and steams out to sea. As soon as they are out far enough to prevent Florence from returning to shore she is told by Kate of the plans they have made to take her to Russia. The hardened woman laughs at the heiress' plea for mercy and leaves her alone and weeping. The captain of the ship sees Florence and, hoping to take her mind off her trouble, tells her that they will pass the Newfoundland fishing fleet about midnight and that they will soon be within sight of them.

The mention of the fleet arouses new hopes in

The heircss is brought to the fishing village.

Florence and she determines on a desperate plan. The evening passes away and midnight approaches. Florence steals from her state room and goes to the rail of the ship. In the distance she sees the lights of the fishing ship. It takes her but a moment to decide, then she plunges over the side of the speeding vessel and into the seething water.

For some minutes she struggles in the water while the ship disappears slowly toward the east Just as her strength begins to fail her she is sighted by one of the fishing vessels and in a short time they have her safely aboard. She is carried back to the fishing village on the isle where the wife of her rescuer cares for her.

The next day a wireless reaches New York saying that Florence Gray jumped into the sea from the ocean liner and was drowned. The countess comes and consoles Susan and Jim but Jones warns Jim to beware of her as she is not a good woman.

In the fishing village Florence recovers her health but day after day she sits gazing out into the sea. The shock of her experience has made her mind a blank.

English Book on Photoplaywriting

"Playwriting For The Cinema," by Ernest A. Dench which was recently published by Adam and Charles Black of London is a text book which should prove very valuable for those who are experiencing their first difficulties in the scenario field despite the fact that it does not treat very many new points.

It is written for the especial benefit of the English writer and is handled more or less from that point of view. Much of the material has been touched upon by the American writers who have taken up this subject but is all presented from a fresh and interesting point of view.

The chapter on plot development shows that the author has a thorough knowledge of his subject and should prove helpful to those who are struggling to master the foundation of the screen play. There are many angles of the script preparation which have been overlooked in previous books of this kind that are taken up by the author of this one and these are certain to prove of great assistance to the beginner.

The book has 96 pages and a handy index which refers to the certain subject a reader may wish to locate for particular purposes. It can be conscientiously recommended to any writer who has had but limited experience.

Thinks He Can Act

John Noble, director of "Our Mutual Girl," is constantly in receipt of letters from persons anxious to become identified in some fashion with this very successful serial. They are from people of high and low degree, from highly educated folk as well as the reverse and are frequently humorous or pathetic, according to the point of view. The following, which has not been altered in the slightest, and which may be taken either way, was recently received from a resident of Jersey City, N. J., whose name or address, for obvious reasons, will not be reprinted here:

"Dear Sir:—Kindly except this as an application for position at stage sitting of Photo Plays or any vacancy you may have. Hoping you will consider this and that I may reseive a favoriable reply as I am interested in the Photo Play business including Photo Play writing, and intend putting Photo Plays out about the first of October or November and would like to get in right. I remain, Yours Obediently, ————."

Carrying the plague victims to their last resting place.

The earthquake wrecks the tomb and kills Nina.

Story Grips With Its Awfulness

Corelli Novel Filmed

"VENDETTA," the famous novel of Marie Corelli, has been done in films by the talented Cines Company and will be released in five reels by George Kleine, through the special feature department of the General Film Company on September 1.

The thrilling and gruesome story of the novel is splendidly told in the picture drama and the horrible parts of the story, while still horrible, in a sense, are not nearly so repulsive to see on the screen as one might imagine after having read the book. The interest is sustained to the very last foot of the five-reel subject and never once allowed to lag or falter.

Players new to the American public are seen in the leading roles of "Vendetta," but all acquit themselves nobly and are deserving of the highest praise for the skillful handling of their parts. Regina Badet, who appears as Nina Romani, the surpassingly beautiful but cold hearted and faithless wife of the hero of the story, proves herself a consummate actress and chief honors easily fall to her. Miss Badet's physical charms are undeniable, while her emotional work in the latter portion of the film stamps her at once as a real artiste.

The beautiful and faithless Nina enchants her husband's friend.

The settings of the story are many of them actual scenes on and about the bay of Naples and are beautifully photographed, while the interiors, particularly those showing the ball room of the Romani mansion and the tomb, in which Count Romani is buried, are most strikingly convincing. The earthquake which destroys a whole street before one's eyes, shakes down the gigantic chandeliers in the ball room and entombs the faithless wife of Count Romani in the underground vault, is a splendid bit of stagecraft and sure to thrill any audience which beholds its remarkably realistic effect.

As the story opens we see the villa of Count Fabio Romani, on the shore of the bay of Naples, and behold a pretty scene with his wife and little daughter Stella. Soon Guido Ferrari, the lifelong friend of Romani, arrives and is invited to take tea with his host and hostess. It becomes immediately apparent that the countess is much interested in Ferrari —more so, perhaps, than mere hospitality demands, and it is not surprising, therefore, when, upon adjourning to the music room of the Romani villa we see the countess and Guido taking advantage of every opportunity to show their interest in each other.

Though a great plague has broken out in Naples and the newspapers state that it is unsafe for residents of the suburbs to journey into the city, Fabio one day finds it imperative that he visit Naples on business, and accordingly he goes into the city despite the danger. Within a short distance of his home he comes upon the plague wracked body of an humble peasant and endeavors to do what he can to alleviate the suffering of the dying man, though he is well aware that in so doing he is taking his own life in his hands.

While returning from his visit to the city he is himself seized with the plague and drops beside the roadway. Here he is found, taken for dead and, being identified by papers found in his pockets, is conveyed to the Romani family vault after having been placed in a flimsily constructed casket. News of his death is then conveyed to his wife the countess, but the strange woman seems to evince little sorrow over her loss and immediately devotes more attention to Guido, who by now is plainly in love with her.

After some hours in the tomb the body of Fabio stirs in its wooden resting place, and soon the inmate of the cheaply constructed casket is able to burst the bonds which hold him and struggles forth to find himself in the underground tomb of his ancestors. In breaking his way out of the casket in which he has been confined Fabio has knocked another coffin to the floor and the broken cover reveals a tremendous hoard of jewels, gems and treasure within. Upon further investigation the revived Fabio finds a note saying that this is the treasure of a brigand chief which has been concealed for more than a century.

A cheerful domestic scene in the Romani home.

Well nigh overcome by the good fortune which has befallen him in discovering the hidden wealth, and fearful lest his wife and child are suffering an agony of torture over his supposed death, Fabio hastens to dig his way out of the vault, planning to return, a multi-millionaire, to his family and make them twice happy over his miraculous escape from death.

Hastening again into the city, Fabio purchases such clothing as he needs and while there discovers with surprise that his terrible experience has turned his hair white. Feeling sure, however, that his family will be overjoyed to see him in spite of his white hair he hastens home and is amazed to find his wife in the garden in the arms of Guido. Their loving attitude proves conclusively to Fabio that it is not a matter of the moment but something which must have been going on for weeks and months without his knowledge. All his love turns to hate in a moment and he takes the terrible oath of vendetta or revenge, vowing to square all scores with those who have disrupted his home.

Permitting his beard to grow long, donning dark glasses to shield his eyes, and assuming the name of Count Cesare Oliva, Fabio returns some weeks later and, now being well equipped with funds, finds it an easy task to become acquainted with Guido and to be invited to meet Guido's fiancee, the Countess Romani. Fabio's disguise is perfect and as time passes he finds himself a frequent visitor at his former home. His attentions to the countess are most marked and he makes her lavish gifts, thereby winning her profound admiration, for the countess seems to revel in luxuries and to bestow her affection upon anyone who will provide her with them.

Stella, the countess' child, is taken deathly ill and the mother, fearful of contracting the disease, refuses to even go to her bedside, so that Fabio finds it an easy matter to console his daughter in her last hours and even goes so far as to reveal himself to his child before she dies. During a period when Guido is out of the city, Fabio makes love to the countess and being dazzled by his unlimited wealth, he is able to lay the foundation for his vengeance, and obtain the countess' promise to marry him.

The engagement is announced at a dinner which Fabio gives upon Guido's return to the city. Guido is so overwhelmed by the announcement that he lets his anger get the best of him and strikes Count Oliva. A duel follows, of course, and Fabio kills Guido. Before his victim dies Count Oliva lifts his glasses and permits Guido to see that he has been shot by none other than Fabio Romani.

The heartless countess is so unaffected by the death of Guido that she agrees to marry Fabio the following week. The night of the wedding arrives and all is mirth and gaiety at the countess' villa. When the merriment is at its height Fabio suggests to Nina that they steal away and gaze upon the vast treasure he possesses. Eager to behold the wealth of her husband, Nina readily consents, though she is astonished when she finds herself being led down the dark causeway which leads to the tomb of the Romani.

Once alone with his victim in the underground tomb, Fabio shows Nina the gems, jewels and vast hoard of wealth concealed within the casket he has found, and then removes his disguise. The countess gasps with amazement when she sees that the man she has married is her former husband, alive and well. Fabio pictures for her the heartlessness she displayed in allowing their child to die unattended, shows her the emptiness of her life and tells her that he is going to leave her buried alive in the tomb. Nina is driven insane; she raves, tears her hair, fondles the jewels, shrieks for mercy, curses her captor, weeps and well nigh persuades Fabio to relent in his plan.

Suddenly, however, there is a rush and roar, the earth trembles beneath them, and in an earthquake which shakes the entire city, buries hundreds alive in the streets, kills many of the guests at the wedding feast and destroys untold property, the tomb itself crumbles, totters and falls upon the crazed countess, forever extinguishing her life. Fabio, believing it the vengeance of the gods, rushes from the ruined vault in a panic, his vendetta accomplished.

Sans Grease Paint and Wig

By Mabel Condon

Mary Pickford.

AN informal visit with Mary Pickford one afternoon last week, furnishes me with a timely topic and you, if you read far enough, with the information first hand—or second, if you wish—for Mary told me and I'm telling you—that Mary is not particularly overjoyed with the sudden exceptional burst of publicity which has come her way with the reissuing of old time "Mary" films. I'll tell it to you just as Mary told it to me.

It was the day in the Famous Players studio that Jim Kirkwood hesitated over the history of his life and then sat for that picture that didn't justify his raw-boned manliness a bit. And it was while he was hesitating that Mary Pickford emerged from an "extra" dressing-room, in a pink silk negligee and pink rose-budded boudoir cap. And her arms were about a round little white-robed body which nestled into the silky softness of the negligee, and looked out at us from round, blue eyes that bespoke the satisfied contentment of the four-months old owner.

But it was the shade of the four-months old's head that caught and held the attention of Mr. Kirkwood. At one time in Mr. Kirkwood's life, the covering of his own head had been just so, and of the same color, so of course Mr. Kirkwood was interested and broke forth in rosy predictions of what the future held for one so proud as was the four-months old.

"To think," regretted Mary, "that that sweet little face will some-time grow a horrid beard."

"And to think," enlightened Mr. Kirkwood, "that those sweet little legs will, on Saturday nights presumably, bring their owner home this way." Let your imagination draw a zig-zag across this page and you will have the demonstration supplied by Mr. Kirkwood.

"Jimmie!" expostulated Mary, turning her armful of man-baby away from the maker of such a suggestion, "just look at his round little feet—he's all round—and so good! His mother says I may mind him for a while, so, when Jimmie's through talking, come over to my dressing-room—will you?"

So when I thought "Jimmie" was through, I went.

But Jimmie was by no means through, as, with his "Grease Paint" chat over, he became much more talkative and bobbed in and out of Mary's dressing-room every few minutes.

"He's an awful tease," said Mary as, after discovering by an investigation of the infant's bib that he shared the initial "J" with him, Mr. Kirkwood set out to find the mother to learn if the baby's name wasn't Jim.

"But everybody likes him," added Mary, "and it's really fun and not like work at all, making pictures with him. The cast of 'The Eagle's Mate' was so congenial that we had the nicest time imaginable making the exterior scenes. I went to the Strand to see the film on its second night there." She paused and patted the round little body of the four-months old. The caress must have been a soothing one, for the round one's round eyes promptly closed and Mary smiled down at him and whispered "asleep," whereupon the round one's round eyes opened and surveyed Mary and her blue-grey ones. And Mary smiled back and continued:—

"I really ought not to go to see any of my own pictures." Her upper lip expressed her sorrow at something and I asked why.

"Because it's such an ordeal for me," she answered, "I sit tight on the edge of the seat and keep thinking 'Will they like it?' and I criticize every move I make and, really, I don't have a bit of a good time! If others were as critical as I, I'm afraid people wouldn't like my work at all."

"But they do like you," I insisted and suggested, "I wonder if you have any idea of just how much you are liked?" Mary looked thoughtful and said hesitatingly, "I can't realize they like me that well, but look," she smiled eagerly and with her right hand swept aside a newspaper on the table beside her. The act disclosed countless letters as yet unopened and there was a package loosely done up in tissue-paper.

"I got this one this morning from a girl in a hospital in Baltimore," she passed me the tissue-paper package. It contained a sewing apron of daintiest lawn and was embroidered in artistic blue and white butterflies. A note attached explained that the donor had made it while lying ill for weeks and assured Mary that it betokened much love and admiration. Could the ill little girl have witnessed Mary's joy over its possession, I'm sure she would be repaid for her work of love.

It was then that the subject of the re-issuing of the Mary films was reached and Mary declared indignantly that she did not like it very well. "For many of those early films were made when I was not as happy as I am now—and condition always affects one's work," rocking the round one, now really asleep, gently in the low rocker Mary occupied out of regard for the infant's comfort.

"But of course," Mary began philosophically—but I never knew what is was that she had intended to say, for Mr. Kirkwood entered with the disgusted information that the little chap's name was "Joe" instead of "Jim."

"Joseph Porter Riley," practically announced Joe's little mother, appearing from behind Mr. Kirkwood's shoulder. "I named him for "Director Porter," she finished still more proudly.

"Really," explained Mary delightedly, giving Joe an extra joy pat. Then, as she passed the little round one to its mother, she whispered softly, "I'd rather own him than—than fifty thousand dollars!" And little Joe's mother smiled contentedly as she bore the little man away for a waiting scene and Mary, when he had gone, took off her boudoir cap and arranged her curls in preparation for going before the camera in the production of "Behind the Scenes" which Mr. Kirkwood was to direct.

As I said at the beginning it was just an informal visit so I've told it to you just as it occurred.

In French Guiana.—Pathe. The valley of the Santa River rich in tropical foliage and scenic grandeur is one of the real beauty spots of French Guiana, South America. From the coach windows of the little single track railroad, which winds in curious curves up the valley, one sees the ruins of the old village of Tabouna, full of historic interest but sad in its significance. Further on the falls of the Santa, with its cascades resplendent in rainbow beauty, dash headlong into a thickly wooded valley below and flow peacefully over moss covered rocks.

The Crayfish.—Pathe. The crayfish or fresh water lobster is usually found underneath the protecting rocks of shallow river pools. Like the most of his cousins in the great family of crustaceans, he is a night feeder and rarely ventures out from under the great rocks or submerged stumps during the day.

The crayfish is particularly fond of the common garden or angle worm and small chub fish or minnows. His claws, strong and powerfully built for the seizure of his prey, are so firmly attached to his body that one will easily bear his entire weight. The head and thorax of the crayfish are so closely attached as to be practically one part with the rest of his body. For this reason he is unable to move his head, but nature, ever thoughtful and ingenious, has provided him with eyes which can be projected from or drawn within his shell-like covering at will. Though not particularly disturbed when taken from his natural element, water, the caryfish eagerly returns to it when the opportunity affords. Like the lobster he is a substantial article of food and always a tasty addition to the menu.

A Badger Hunt.—Pathe. With a long white snout and small piggish eyes the rapacious little badger, a member of the great bear family, is one of the most destructive animals with which the farmer has to contend. A night prowler, he is omnivorous, and does great damage to the crops as well as among the fowl of the farmyard.

A typical rural pest, the badger slinks away at the first streaks of dawn, and the daylight disclosing the various scenes of his various depredations, finds him safe in his underground home. The mischief committed by the badger during his nocturnal visits provokes the wrath of the farmer, who, with keen scented dogs, trails the animal to its hiding place. There one dog is selected to attack the badger in its tunnel retreat.

With his ear close to the ground the farmer follows the underground battle, and when he thinks the dog has driven the badger to a point sufficiently near the surface, he digs down into the badger's hole. Quite the equal of the dog, the little badger, almost exhausted, moves backward under the new opening. Carefully dropping a long handled pair of steel pincers the farmer catches the badger around the neck and lifts him struggling to the surface. There the frightened animal, blinking but still fighting, is deposited alive and unhurt in a heavy bag. The darkness inside the bag quiets the badger and he is quite safely taken home by the farmer.

Life in Japan.—Pathe. Kioto, once the capital of Japan, is annually the scene of a peculiar religious ceremony which draws thousands of witnesses from all parts of the empire.

Coffee Cultivation.—Pathe. What is sweeter incense to the nostrils of the hungry man than the aroma of that most delightful beverage—coffee. And yet how little is known to the lay mind concerning the cultivation and handling of this, one of the most important of South America's prolific products.

When the berries are ready for picking (they grow on bushy shrubs averaging 8 to 12 feet), the host of workers throng to the fields and quickly garner the ripened crop. When the beans are sifted and winnowed, these processes removing the leaves, twigs, etc., the coffee is measured, put in sacks and transferred to the mills, where it is washed and sorted. After many handlings, which are essential to the thorough drying and preparing of the beans for market, the coffee is graded and sacked and then brought to the warehouses from whence it is shipped to all parts of the civilized world.

The Hosts of the Sea.—Pathe. To the naturalist, ever on the look out for strange and interesting creatures, Dame Nature is a seemingly neverendless provider. On the interesting film under this title appear some of the sea's most grotesque and freakish products. Strange little crustaceans such as the callians, squills, dwarf crabs only an inch long, tiny swordfish, etc., are all shown in their native haunts by the aid of really fine photography.

Thoroughly dried, the hemp filaments are done into bundles which are taken to a separate factory where the center stem of each filament is removed. This process of taking out the woody part of the hemp reed is called "scutching." When it is completed the hemp is a finished product ready for compression into bales and transportation. Conveyed by boat and rail to the great mills it is converted into rope, mats and many other useful articles.

Hemp Growing (New Zealand).—Pathe. One of the most important industries of New Zealand is the growing of hemp. Reedlike in appearance, it attains a height of from ten to twelve feet, and is harvested by the natives with a sharp hook-shaped knife. Bundlers follow the cutters and the hemp is stacked on big carts and carried to the factory, where it is washed, cleaned and dried.

The next step consists of feeding the separate reeds into a special machine which splits them into long slender filaments. These filaments, washed by a mechanical conveyor, are then allowed to drain a full day, after which they are carried to the bleaching field and exposed to the sun for about a week.

Brevities of the Business

Howard G. Bobb, vice president and general manager of the Liberty Motion Picture Company Inc., gained his knowledge of the motion picture business in a very peculiar manner. Resigning his position as president of a prominent Philadelphia pharmaceutical company, he secured a minor position in a motion picture laboratory, where he studied the film business. He remained there until he acquired the technical end of the game. He later induced a number of wealthy Philadelphians to finance him and started the Liberty Motion Picture Company, which has been in active operation for a number of months. Mr. Bobb received his education in the Keystone state and when a lad was always interested in mechanics. He spent his early life in the railroad business. Although only still in his early twenties he is master of a plant that many film notables have said "to be one that is incomparable."

During the absence of Thomas Ince and Mack Sennett, Reginald Barker has been in charge of the Kay Bee, Broncho and Domino Companies and Roscoe Arbunkle and Mabel Normand have been directing the Keystone players.

A. Blinkhorn has opened a branch office in Chicago at 17 North Wabash avenue and Mr. Buck has been installed as manager.

The contracts of William H. Tooker, heavy lead, and Harry Spingler, juvenile lead, of the Life Photo Film Corporation, have been renewed by that company for a further period of one year at a substantial increase of salary.

On last Sunday night a special midnight performance was given at Santa Barbara of Harry Pollard's remarkable "Beauty" picture "The Other Train." The time was set so that all those working in the other theaters could see this photoplay and a very large crowd attended.

Grace Cunard, the heroine of "Lucille Love," has several very tempting offers from both moving picture companies and circuit agents but the most tempting of all was the added inducement to remain with the Universal, the company which has brought her so prominently to the fore and which gave her the opportunities to force herself to the front ranks.

The World Film Corporation has opened an office in Montreal, at 282 St. Catherine Street West, with R. S. Bell, formerly of their Toronto branch, in charge of W. F. Barrett, former manager of the feature department of the General Film Company in Canada, has been put in charge of the Toronto office.

George Fitzmaurice of Pathe, who this spring stepped from the ranks of scenario editors to become a director, announces the completion of his first picture, "The Brahmin Diamond." Mr. Fitzmaurice spent nine years in India and he has drawn upon his knowledge of the unchanging East in this picture the scenario of which he wrote himself.

During the filming of a coming three reel Eclair feature, Alec B. Francis was placed in a closed coffin and when the scene had been completed and the lid removed with difficulty he was found to be almost suffocated, the box having been so securely sealed that no air reached him.

Frank A. Bannon is spending his vacation at Inlet Inn, Fourth Lake, New York. After a few weeks stay at the Adirondack resort Mr. Bannon will be found back at his desk at the Edison studio distributing scintillating publicity on the plays and players.

If the "Trey of Hearts" series never did anything else for Cleo Madison who takes the dual role of the twin sisters, it would certainly give her the reputation for being about a most plucky actress. During the fifth installment of the series, "The Sunset Tide," Cleo makes a get away from her pursuers in a rowboat which she pushes through the breakers. The boat upset and she was caught underneath and although Wilfred Lucas, Ed. Sloman, George Larkin and Ray Hanford all went after her they experienced great difficulty in rescuing her and she frightened them all by being unconscious for some time.

The World Film Corporation announces the release of the Shubert Feature, "The Lure," in five acts, on August 24, and the preparation of the following W. A. Brady features, "The Dollar Mark," "Mother," "The Man of the Hour" and "The Gentleman from Mississippi."

Edwin August left one or two things behind him when he deserted Los Angeles for New York City. One was his ranch where the chickens grow into hens and cockadoodledoos or else die young under the knife and fork name of squabs. Then there are his father and mother who live on the ranch and lastly, and of the least consequence is a law suit against a film company in Los Angeles.

Carlyle Blackwell has been a busy man this week. He has engaged the Norbig studios at Edendale and has securred Jack Dillon for heavies, Edna Mayo for leads opposite himself, Adelaide Wise, George N. Chesebro, Ollie Kirkby and others who will appear in the four reeler "The Key to Yesterday" by Charles Neville Buck.

Manager Callan of the Plaza Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., is trying to find the culprit who stole a 22x28 hand-painted photograph of Mabel Normand, the popular Keystone "movie" star from the lobby of the theater between 9 and 11 o'clock one morning last week.

Francis Ford and Grace Cunard of the Universal are putting on a four reel German-French photoplay with the war as a central theme.

On Tuesday, August 11, Chad Fisher, a Vitagraph cameraman, while taking pictures at Yonkers, N. Y., was instantly killed by lightning. Captain Lambart, the director, had taken a company of Vitagraph players to that locality and were in the midst of their work when a terrific storm burst upon them and they sought shelter in an inn. A bolt of lightning struck the front of the building a moment later, killing Mr. Fisher and severely burning and stunning Captain Lambart and Miss Lillian Herbert, one of the Vitagraph players.

A new leading man has entered the Benham family or rather, he has been there some time without being discovered. It is Leland, Harry Benham's six year old son. The little fellow lately played the principal part in the Thanhouser drama, "In Peril's Path," but Harry is anything but jealous because he is no longer the only leading man in the family.

Owing to the delicate style of her beauty and her quiet retiring nature, Miss Vinnie Burns, the clever little star of the Solax and Blache Companies, impresses her friends in private life as merely a bright young miss who has recently graduated from some girl's finishing school rather than the daring picture heroine that she really is. Her greatest pleasure is to be alone at home with her mother.

Wilfred Lucas, the producer, is so brown it would not pay for him to cross the Mexican line. He has been in his element lately taking sea and ship scenes for he dearly loves a boat.

Harry Eytinge, Edison character man, has finally decided on the place to spend his vacation—the Edison studio. As a mere statement this contains no excitement at all, but when one considers that Harry weighs above the two hundred mark and that the rays of the sun have a way of being exceedingly hot after passing through a glass roof it is evident that he will have the warmest kind of weather for his period of rest (?). In fact, the chances are that he will accumulate more sunburn than the ordinary vacationer.

William D. Taylor the director of the Balboa Company at Long Beach, can almost claim that his experiences in direction date back to the time when he spent three years in Fanny Davenport's company and did about everything to be done in that company as well as playing opposite her. He even went to Europe yearly to purchase certain necessary properties for her plays.

William Garwood has had two fine parts recently in which to give examples of his artistry. In "The Cocoon and the Butterfly" he was the owner of a department store and in "Break, Break, Break," from the poem, he appeared as an old man who saw incidents in his life unfolded. It is not often Garwood is seen in characters, yet he is a character actor of attainment.

Asked what she was going to do in her next picture, Stella Razeto the popular Selig actress said "I don't know and am trembling to think of what my director has in store for me. I did about everything in 'The Blue Flame' and the next picture is the last of this detective series."

Anna Little is wearing several new gowns in "Caroline" a delightful comedy-drama being produced at the Universal. There was a time when Anna used to wear Western garb nearly all the time and she looked very fetching in them too, but of late she has been wearing society and "costume" dresses and now everyone is wondering what she does look the best in.

Ethel Lloyd won the silver cup offered as a prize to the best dancer of the Vitagraph Company by the Hotel Shelburne management on "Vitagraph Night," August 6. The dancing for the prize, resolved itself into an elimination contest with Miss Lloyd and Lillian Walker as the contestants. After many trials Miss Lloyd was adjudged the winner and presented with the cup, a massive silver affair, suitably engraved.

Bess Meredyth is still writing the photoplay versions of "The Trey of Hearts" series from the synopsis of Vance's stories and she is also appearing with Al. E. Christie's comedies.

Herbert Blache of Blache Features, Inc., has announced a four-reel picture entitled "The War Extra" which contains scenes taken at Fort Lee, N. J., Herald Square, The Mallory Line Steamship Docks and The Statue of Liberty in New York, Key West, Florida, Galveston, El Paso and Eagle Pass, Texas, and Piedras Nagrus and Monclova Coahuila, Mexico.

Frank Powell, Pathe director, had some exciting times while making "The Taint" which has just been finished. He bought a modern locomotive for the sole purpose of turning it into scrap iron before his cameras and Edward Jose, his leading man, was to make his escape from pursuers by starting the engine and letting it run wild. Mr. Jose succeeded in jumping from the engine but the number of sumersaults he took on the steep bank would have been a marvel to a circus acrobat. The engine itself narrowly missed hitting the platform on which Mr. Powell and his camera were stationed.

Agnes Egan Cobb reports that telegrams, letters and orders are pouring in from all over the country regarding "Horrors of War." This subject was named previous to the war but timely enough to warrant tremendous sales. And then they say "money is tight."

Fred Beecroft has gone forth from the Mirror offices in the Putnum building to the mirroring lakes up in the Maine woods. This he claims as an old and well-known recreation center and it will offer him entertainment for a well earned two weeks. Mrs. Beecroft accompanied him on his vacation trip.

Ned Finley, the Vitagraph director, whose mysterious disappearance from Jacksonville, Fla., terminated in his being found in Union Square, N. Y., with no knowledge of how he had come there, is now fully recovered from the illness which confined him to his hotel for several days. He is again at work at the Vitagraph studio.

Sol Lesser of the Golden Gate Film Exchange has purchased the rights for his eleven western states on Leading Players feature, "The Lunatics," and has also signed a year's contract with Agnes Egan Cobb for two Scientia subjects each week.

Harvey L. Gates, he who gets out the Universal Weekly and in his spare moments writes scenarios that he readily sells, has purchased a five-passenger Regal car and is educating his nine-months-old son to prefer it to a baby carriage. As the nine-months-old is named for Romaine Fielding, he is complying with all that is expected of him.

W. W. Johnston no more presides at the publicity desk in the Excelsior offices. He has taken his good nature elsewhere and P. A. Parsons of the Pathe Jersey studio, and C. Alfred Karpen, well known for his service in the Eclectic suite, are dividing the work of the Johnston desk between them, as well as performing their other respective duties.

Agnes Egan Cobb is doing herself proud these days, and reports she is having lots of fun booking Scientia films in and around New York. Mrs. Cobb claims that the demand for the educational product is growing so strong that the customers are signing up yearly contracts with her for the Scientia films.

The first photoplay ever written by Maibelle Heikes Justice, whose name is now well known to the trade, was released by the Vitagraph Company on August 13 under the title of "The Horse Thief." Most of Miss Justice's plays have been produced by the Selig and Essanay Companies.

Edna Maison made a great impression upon everyone with her work in "Madame Melnotte" in which photoplay Gilbert Warrenton, Lloyd Ingraham's camera man, made four double exposures with Edna in each scene.

Harry Pollard keeps up his work of "infinite variety" for the Beauty brand. Last week he finished up a comedy which is as humorous as any he has ever made, and this week he is putting on a drama, at present not named, in which he has a very strong part showing the unselfishness of a strong moralled man.

Wilfred Lucas is nearly happy. He is working day and night to make his productions of "The Trey of Hearts" great in every way, and he is revelling in the many fine sets he has planned and is having made to order.

Ed. J. Le Saint of Selig's forces, has been producing a civil war drama entitled "The Reparation" without the presence of armies and of the horrors of war. It is full of good dramatic action and heart interest.

Every young actor undergoes a siege of letters the gist of which is "Are you married?" Charles Ray, the good looking Kay Bee lead, is the most recent of these victims. Is Charles Ray married? A prize of steen property dollars is offered for the correct answer. A sleuth who has been on Charles' trail for the last month or so does not think so, he deducts that Charles is too debonnaire and never looks worried and that moreover he is always jingling money in his trousers pocket.

Louise Glaum and her director Harry Edwards are no longer confined to the "Universal Ike" style of comedies and are now doing plays of all classes. Their initial effort in the new field is called "The Scarecrow and the Chaperone."

ROLL OF THE STATES

ALABAMA.

The new brick building being erected at Guntersville is nearing completion, and has been leased for five years by Harry A. Hammond, who will run a moving picture show.

CALIFORNIA.

The Equator Film Company, capitalized at $25,000 and organized for the purpose of taking moving pictures around San Diego and exhibiting them at theaters throughout the country, filed articles of incorporation. The incorporators are N. K. Parkhurst, A. B. Bowman, L. C. Wright, C. T. Davenport and M. H. McClure, each of whom has subscribed for but one share of stock, valued at $1 each.

Twentieth Century Players' Film Company, capital stock $250,000; subscribed $25. Directors, A. C. Haartmann, Rollin H. Palmer, A. E. Weiss, Ralph Castillo, E. G. Grubb.

Engineer Hinckley and Park Superintendent Ferguson will start work within a few days removing the municipal bandstand in Redlands and building an open air amphitheater there to seat 2,500 persons, with 500 more accommodated in parking space for autos. Pictures will be shown here.

GEORGIA.

The Temple theater for colored people, located on Cotton avenue, Macon, is one of the best equipped moving picture houses for colored people in the South. It is putting on high class vaudeville also.

ILLINOIS.

The Palace theater on West Third street, St. Charles, is to be reopened under new management. This makes the third picture theater in St. Charles, and the fourth will be opened when the new building on East Main street, under process of construction now by Dr. Potter and F. C. Hunt, is finished.

The Royal theater, in course of construction at 322 Seventh street, Rockford, will open up about the middle of September. Carl Noren is the owner.

W. A. Ross, owner of two picture theaters in Hoopeston, bought out the business of Max Nathan, who for years conducted the Virginian. Manager Ross now has complete control of the field in Hoopeston.

Edward Churchill, general manager of the Saxe Amusement Enterprises, recently completed a deal by which that company takes over the Hippodrome theater of Peoria for a period of ten years.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in MOTOGRAPHY as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

Sir John Cotswold and Sir Isaac Jacobson vow that their families shall not mate in Lubin's five-part production, "The House Next Door."

MOTOGRAPHY

WITH WHICH IS INCORPORATED THE NICKELODEON

Vol. XII CHICAGO, SEPTEMBER 5, 1914 No. 10

Lubin Films "The House Next Door"

Has Strong Theme

"THE HOUSE NEXT DOOR," adapted from J. Hartley Manner's play of the same name, will be the next offering of the Lubin Manufacturing Company through the General Film Company's special feature department. The production is in five reels and is filled with situations and incidents that are true to life in every respect and which place it in a distinct position among the masterpieces of the screen.

The cast is a large one and as each of the players lends his or her best effort the general effect is worthy of the highest praise. Prominent among those in the cast are Edwin Barbour, Gaston Bell, Ethel Clayton, George Soule Spencer, Frankie Mann and Joseph Kaufman, upon whose shoulders the leading characterizations rest and whose work is especially convincing. The other players, who have less opportunity, also do excellent work with their respective roles and throughout the entire five thousand feet not a jarring note can be noticed in the acting.

The settings are truly wonderful in their depth and arrangement and Director O'Neal deserves great credit for the clever manner in which the entire production is staged. Three of the sets, the interior of a theater, a parlor and a reception room, are especially striking and are certain to excite the admiration of all who view the film. The scene in which the wall of a house falls is well done and convincing.

The lovers seek Sir Isaac's blessing.

The dramatic action of the story moves evenly forward to the climax and every crisis is made impressive. The idea behind the plot is deep rooted and is developed to the best advantage. The photography is clear and the subject, considered as a whole, is one of great merit.

The story opens at the home of Sir John Cotswold who, with his wife and two children, Cecil and Ulrica, keeps up a fair appearance of rather poor aristocracy. In the park the children are wont to play with other children among whom are Adrian and Esther Jacobson, children of Isaac Jacobson, a humble but honest Jewish chairmaker. The Chrisian parents chide their children for playing with "Jewish brats."

Sir John's affairs are in bad condition and his attorney informs him that he is likely to become bankrupt. On the other hand the poor neighbors are in good fortune for one day a patent lawyer notifies

Jacobson that a machine he has invented had been granted a patent with prospects that the results will make him rich.

maturity and the chair maker, now wealthy, lives in a mansion next door to Sir John Cotswold. The children, not forgetting their childhood days, renew acquaintance and fall in love all round. Cecil Cotswold ardently woos Esther Jacobson and Adrian Jacobson pays sweet court to Ulrica Cotswold. Then comes the clash of race and religions and both of the fathers open deadly opposition to the love affairs of their children, who still meet clandestinely.

Cecil Cotswold develops a wonderful voice and, although the family are far from comfortable in their financial condition, Ulrica draws upon her personal inheritance and sends her brother to Italy for tuition, much against the wishes of the old baronet, who declares that his son shall never become a singer or, as he calls it, a mountebank. Cecil and Esther part with vows that they will always remain true in their love.

Sir John proposes to select a husband for his daughter and introduces an aristocrat named Trevor, but Ulrica has no use for the insipid dandy and is very clever in letting him see it. Sir John, however, manages to make matters appear rosy in Trevor's eyes.

Two years later Cecil returns and is to make his debut at the Grand Opera House in the role of Faust. Both families eagerly await the event and all attend the performance except Sir John. The performance scores the most pronounced success. The singers are showered with bouquets, while hats and handkerchiefs are waved in the air, the entire audience being upon their feet. The Cotswolds and Jacobsons shake hands heartily from adjoining boxes.

Cecil's triumph does not appease the old man, however, and the next day when the drawing room is packed with flowers Sir John, to vent his temper, scatters the bouquets on the floor. Jacobson seeks reconciliation but the other man is obstinate.

The next blow to Sir John is the fact that Isaac Jacobson has been knighted in recompense for his many good and charitable deeds. Jacobson notices that the foundation of the Cotswold mansion is becoming weak and sinking into a sewer. As the houses adjoined, Sir Isaac employes the builders to make repairs. The digging and noise of the workmen causes Sir John much annoyance and he hurls many insults at his neighbor. One night during the progress of the repairs a dancing party is given in Sir Isaac's home. The merriment is at its height when a fearful crash is heard. The guests rush out just as the "House Next Door" collapses. The guests rush to the rescue and Jacobson enters the falling building and brings out Sir John. The old man is taken into the Jacobson

Mystery Film Adapted from Munsey Tale

"The Devil's Signature"

AN odd mystery story, which really keeps the denouement from the audience until the last few hundred feet of film, will be released by Essanay under the title "The Devil's Signature" on Friday, September 11. It was adapted from a story in one of the recent Munsey magazines.

Such popular stars as Beverly Bayne, Richard Travers, Bryant Washburn, Charles Hitchcok and Thomas Commerford have prominent roles in the enactment of the story and ere the picture ends one beholds some clever lighting effects and a few fine stage sets.

It is upon the suspense and mystery element in the story that the success of the film lies, however, and since this reviewer firmly believes that audiences like to be puzzled and mystified instead of taken entirely into the confidence of the author, as when one is shown each step in the development of a story, he ventures to predict that "The Devil's Signature" will prove a decided success from the box office standpoint. Folks who like detective tales or stories of the unique and out-of-the-ordinary kind, and those who enjoy weird and bizarre explanations of the mysteries they see presented in photoplay form, will fairly revel in this latest offering of the Essanay Company.

The dead body of Craven, with its cloven hoof, was found.

As the story opens Ethel Vandiver and her friend, Marie Le Farve, arrive at the former's country home for a week-end visit. They are met by Ethel's father and Craven, the mulatto gardener of the Vandiver estate, and escorted up to the big mansion.

Ethel finds a letter awaiting her, signed "Douglas," which proves to be from a young man whom her father has forbidden to see her, as he has taken a strong dislike to the suitor for Ethel's hand. In his letter Douglas states that he "would rather see her dead, than be separated from her longer." Ethel bursts into tears upon reading the letter, but her friend, Marie, tries to console her by declaring that all will come right in the end.

It later develops that Douglas has followed Ethel to her country home, and at the hotel he encounters William Sanford, a young newspaper reporter on his vacation. The young men adjourn to a nearby bar to talk things over and while there Douglas tells Sandford that he is well nigh desperate over Vandiver's objections to his seeing Ethel, whom he loves devotedly, he says.

The detective explains the mystery of the closet.

Craven explains that Ethel's room is haunted.

Shortly after Ethel and Marie have retired for the night, Ethel dashes downstairs to inform her father that strange noises in her room make it impossible for her to sleep. Her father laughs at her fears, but Craven, the mulatto servant, explains that "Miss Ethel is occupying the haunted room" and it is probably on that account that she is unable to rest. Marie has been awakened by Ethel's movements and after hearing the story of her friend's fears volunteers to change rooms with her, declaring that she is not afraid of ghosts or hobgobblins. Accordingly the girls change sleeping rooms and Marie goes to bed in the chamber previously occupied by Ethel.

Later that night Douglas enters the grounds of the Vandiver estate and by throwing pebbles up against Ethel's window awakens his sweetheart and tosses in a note in which he begs for a few moments conversation with her. Ethel tries to steal down to admit her lover, but finds her father still in the library, so deems it unsafe to open the door for the man to whom her father had forbidden the house. A few moments later Douglas is seen making his way out of the grounds with his hand cut and bleeding. He wipes the blood off on a handkerchief and then tosses the bloody handkerchief to one side.

Back in the house Ethel and her father are suddenly startled by hearing a scream and upon investigating they find Marie dead in her bed, with everything indicating that she has been murdered. No clues are found to indicate who committed the deed, so Vandiver telephones to the city for a detective.

Sandford, the reporter, is enjoying his after-breakfast cigar on the hotel porch the next morning when he sees Huff, one of his friends of the city detective bureau, registering at the clerk's desk. He enters into conversation with the detective and learns that he has come out from the city on the murder mystery at the Vandiver mansion. Sandford accompanies Huff to the house to secure a story for his paper.

The two men are met and conducted through the mansion by old Mr. Vandiver and while in the death chamber Huff finds the letter which Ethel had received from Douglas. The words "would rather see you dead than separated from you longer" instantly lead Huff to assume that Douglas is the murderer, and that he had supposed he was killing Ethel instead of Marie. Mr. Vandiver, hating Douglas already, instantly sides in with the detective and when Craven, the servant, brings in a blood stained handkerchief bearing Douglas' initials, the sleuth is positive he has solved the mystery.

Sandford notes, however, a queer mark on the rug near the dead girl's bed, and, calling for some flour, he dusts it over the rug and thus brings out the queer track. It is circular in shape and in no way fits in with the detective's theory of the crime. When Douglas is arrested, some hours later, he declares he had a fight with a negro near the house the night before and was badly cut in the scuffle. The blood he wiped off on the handkerchief and then tossed away the bloody rag. A few minutes later a negro is found who admits meeting and fighting with Douglas, who was prowling around the house, so Huff finds that his case is farther from solution than ever.

Acting on the theory that the murderer will return to the scene of his crime, Sandford and Huff hide in the bedchamber and await his coming. Some time later the door of a big clothes closet at one end of the room opens slowly, and a gruesome, clawlike hand is thrust out. The detective makes a dash toward the doors, but when they are flung open the closet is found to be empty. Later, the door again starts to open and Huff sends four bullets from his revolver crashing into the closet. Again the closet is opened and again it is found to be empty. Furthermore no trace of the bullets can be found and Huff, declaring that the whole case is mysterious and supernatural and the strange mark on the rug is the "devil's signature" is about ready to give up, when Sandford finds a method of opening the back of the cupboard.

A secret passage is found in the wall, back of the cupboard and from it some steps lead down into a dark basement. Sandford grimly follows the trail he has uncovered and at the foot of the stairs he finds the dead body of Craven, with four bullet holes in it. One of Craven's shoes has been removed and the detective and the reporter are amazed to discover that instead of a foot, Craven's limb ends in a cloven hoof. This, of course, proves conclusively that Craven was the man who made the track in the rug near Marie's bed, which had proven so puzzling.

Investigation discloses that Craven for some time has been acting queerly, that he had changed from a half-wit to an insane beast within a comparatively short time, and that in a moment of madness he had deliberately murdered Marie, without any possible sort of a motive. Ethel meanwhile discloses to her father the fact that she and Douglas have been married for more than a year, the ceremony having been a most quiet one, and upon the suggestion of Sandford old Mr. Vandiver consents to the union of his daughter with Douglas.

The complete cast is as follows:

Ethel Vandiver.....Beverly Bayne
Her father.....Thomas Commerford
Douglas, her husband.....Bryant Washburn
William Sandford, a newspaper reporter.Richard C. Travers
Marie Le Farve.....Betty Brown
Craven, the mulatto gardener.....Charles Hitchcock
Huff, the detective.....Frank Dayton

Pathe Film for Hammerstein's House

The Eclectic-Pathe American-made feature "The Last Volunteer" was selected to open the splendid new Hammerstein Opera House at Lexington avenue and Fiftieth street, New York, on August 22.

Famous Players Celebrates Birthday

Output to be Increased

SEPTEMBER 1 marks the anniversary of the Famous Players Feature Program, the inauguration of one of the first regular programs of feature films in the world, and the organization of the systematic feature service of which the present powerful Paramount Pictures Corporation is the sequel.

The now celebrated "30 Famous Features," launched a year ago, created an entirely new branch of the great motion picture art, and opened a novel field of endeavor for manufacturer, exchange and exhibitor that has been vitally effective in elevating the motion picture to a more dignified plane and securing for it an infinitely greater degree of popularity than it could otherwise ever have attained.

This vast development of an original and daring enterprise, this amazing evolution of a now historical inception, automatically bears tribute to the vision and determination of one man—Adolph Zukor. The pioneer in the presentation of famous plays and celebrated stars in motion pictures, with a fervent confidence in the artistic and commercial possibilities of his plan, not a whit mitigated by the discouragements and obstacles surrounding his early efforts, Adolph Zukor, struggling against all the difficulties that beset the path-finder, has realized a success such as comes once in a generation.

The presentation of Sarah Bernhardt in "Queen Elizabeth," and James K. Hackett in his famous characterization, "The Prisoner of Zenda," is now tradition: and the extended policy of thirty releases a year that resulted from the demand created by these two subjects, and culminated in the tremendous plans of the Paramount organization, is the gigantic materialization of one man's purpose.

Adolph Zukor, the apostle of feature films.

The early history of the Famous Players is chronicled in the present success of the feature film business of America; the record of its accomplishment is written on the screens of the thousands of feature theaters throughout the country. How Adolph Zukor received the inspiration and impulse to make his radical departure from the regular methods of motion picture production; how he secured for association in the execution of his plan Daniel Frohman, one of the most respected and most prominent theatrical producers in the world, and Edwin S. Porter, the wizard of the camera, the father of the photoplay and the originator of so many of the camera effects now in vogue—this is the commonly known version of the Famous Players' inception. But the growth of the dynamic idea that prompted the organization of the concern, its astounding development and its remarkable future possibilities, is a side-light full of interest and pregnant with optimistic prophecy.

Mr. Zukor has always attributed the stupendous success of the Famous Players, not to his own initiative and remarkable energies, but to the organization; to the combined efforts of all, to the wonderful harmony that has characterized the entire progress of the company. With a liberality of mind thoroughly typical of the man, he contends that if it were not for the mechanical and artistic genius of Edwin S. Porter, the earnest efforts of Daniel Frohman, the dramatic mastery of Hugh Ford, and the various talents of all the other members of the organization, the Famous Players would never have attained the brilliant success it has achieved.

Mr. Zukor moreover extends the credit for the concern's marvelous record to the loyal and able efforts of Albert A. Kaufman, the energetic and popular studio manager; the scenario and advertising departments, in charge of B. P. Schulberg; Frank Meyer, laboratory superintendent; Richard Murphy, the noted scenic painter, whose masterly work has enriched many of the celebrated Famous Players sets; William Reilly, whose knack of getting the right props in every set is a thing of wonder, and the many camera-men, who under the supervision of Mr. Porter, have created the high standard of photography for which the concern became noted as soon as its first picture appeared.

To return to a review of the activities of the Famous Players during the past year, it is a notable and decisive fact that the concern has made several affiliations with powerful theatrical producing companies and universally celebrated authors that created widespread comment at the time of these alliances, and that are still generally discussed. The first of these important coalitions was with David Belasco, for the film production of his artistic success, "A Good Little Devil." Shortly after this came the affiliation with Henry W. Savage, whom the leading film producers of the country were long anxious to secure; and before the excitement of this gigantic junction of important film and theatrical interests had subsided, the announcement was made that the Famous Players had secured all the celebrated dramatic successes of Charles Frohman, the last powerful theatrical producer to enter the film business. More recently it was disclosed that an arrangement had been entered into between the Famous Players and Sir Henry Arthur Jones, the distinguished English dramatist, whereby that concern was tendered the film rights of the most celebrated works of the master playwright.

It will be noticed by the new borders around the Famous Players advertisements in the trade papers that the familiar "30 Famous Features a year" has been changed to "36 Famous Features." In this quiet manner does the concern announce a substantial increase in its output; and from all indications, before Paramount has been long in existence we may expect 48 or 50 Famous Players subjects a year. This expansion is only a natural result of the phenomenal demand for this product. Next year's thirty-six productions will be directed by the following staff of producers: Edwin S. Porter, Hugh Ford, who abandoned his position as the foremost producer on the legitimate stage to become associated with the Famous Players; Allan Dwan, James Kirkwood and William T. Heffron.

And when the inevitable historian writes the history of the film industry he will record Adolph Zukor as the apostle of the feature, the immortalizer of the visual half of the art of the celebrated players of the day, and the creator of a new and important branch of a new and wonderful art.

Bankers Jump at Opportunity

Realizing the important position occupied by the moving picture industry, many of the kest known bankers in the country are backing their money against the brains of ,the well known film man Lewis J. Selznick. In him they have placed every confidence and all responsibility for the success of the World Film Corporation one of the greatest organizations in the business.

Lewis J. Selzinck.

At the recent annual meeting of the board of directors, he was elected vice president and general manager with the following well known men as officers and directors:

Van Horn Ely, president; Lee Shubert, vice president; Lewis J. Selznick, vice president and general manager; Briton N. Busch, secretary and treasurer.

The Board of Directors is composed of: Theodore F. Reynolds, member of New York Stock Exchange; Amory Hodges, of Halstead and Hodges, New York; Van Horn Ely, president of National Properties Co., Delaware; Herbert H. Dean, of Edward B. Smith & Co., bankers; Wm. Alden Pratt. of Edward B. Smith & Co. bankers; Frederick Edey, of Huhn, Edey & Company; Lewis J. Selznick; Briton N. Busch, secretary and treasurer; Jules A. Brulatour, sales agent Eastman Kodak Company; Charles D. Shrady; H. F. MacNamara; George B. Cox, capitalist of Cincinnati, Ohio, and director of the Shubert Theatrical Corporation; Lee Shubert of the Shubert Theatrical Corporation; J. J. Shubert of the Shubert Theatrical Corporation; W. J. Rhinock, Treasurer of the Shubert Theatrical Corporation; and Charles Jourjon, president of Eclair Film Co. of America and Paris.

The corporation owns and operates twenty-four offices situated in the following cities of the United States and Canada: New York, Indianapolis, Buffalo, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Chicago, St. Louis, Seattle, Cleveland, Kansas City, Dallas, San Francisco, Detroit, Cincinnati, New Orleans, Salt Lake City, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh, Washington, Toronto, Boston, Atlanta, Denver, Montreal, through which it distributes by rental to various theaters, motion pictures as supplied to them by the home office, in New York.

This Shubert and Brady affiliation with their Peerless studio at Fort Lee which is the largest in the country, keeping four companies continually at work, makes this combination the greatest factor in the industry.

Mr. Selznick has been quietly making history and from a remark dropped by him to the writer it appears there are many ideas he has for future developments which will revolutionize the film business.

War Affects Olcott Players

The European war has caused the Sid Olcott Company which has been working in Ireland to entirely abandon its contemplated trip to France, Germany and Italy, and the party are now praying for a way to get back to the States in safety. When the last word was received from the party it was extremely doubtful if there would be any British liners running for a time and passage on any boat was very difficult to secure.

It is possible if the war is ended quickly that the company will go into Europe and do some stories, but no definite plans can be made along this line. Fortunately Mr. Olcott has visited Ireland before and so the party will be well provided for there, despite the terrific increase in the prices of foodstuffs.

The war has caused considerable difficulty in the matter of extra men, since every young fellow in Ireland is joining the army. The National Volunteers, who a week before war was declared had been ready to fight the Ulster Volunteers, have now joined hands with them to fight for England.

One of the Olcott company, P. H. O'Malley, who had joined the National Volunteers, has received word that he should report for medical inspection and will undoubtedly have to serve in the defense of Ireland regiments. All of the volunteers have been called on for this work, those who desired to join the regular army being allowed of course to enlist as they do in America.

Mr. Olcott had another set back the week war was declared when he made a trip of forty miles by motor to Valencia harbor to do some scenes, only to learn that the harbor was under martial law and no photographs of any kind could be taken.

Cyrus Townsend Brady Story Filmed

Screened by Selig

The Halton baby is christened.

A SETTLER in the far West, his wife and baby daughter, a frontier "sky pilot," a bootlegger and a band of Indians are the principal characters in the Cyrus Townsend Brady story which the Selig Polyscope Company has recently filmed and which will be released for exhibition on Wednesday, September 2, under the title "When the West Was Young."

Bessie Eyton and Wheeler Oakman are the featured players though such other favorites as Frank Clark, Tom Mix and Harry Lonsdale are also to be seen in the supporting cast. The tale was photographed in the real West and a number of picturesque backgrounds are used in the telling of the interesting story.

The Indians bring gifts to the Halton baby.

Ned Halton and his attractive young bride, Nellie, depart from the middle West in a prairie schooner and travel towards the setting sun to seek for themselves a new home in the western wilds. They traverse the plains until they reach a spot which seems suitable to them for making it their future home and there Ned builds a snug little cabin and the two set up housekeeping.

With the passing of time a baby comes to the happy young people and fills a place in the mother's heart which only a baby can. A neighboring tribe of Indians are most friendly toward the young settler and his wife, and upon learning of the baby's arrival the young bucks come bringing crude gifts of various sorts as presents for the little stranger in their midst. Both father and mother are delighted by the thoughtfulness of their red-skinned neighbors and show their appreciation in no uncertain manner.

A few days later a "sky pilot" chances to pass the cabin of the Halton's and is promptly summoned in to baptise the baby. As a result of this ceremony the Indians look upon the child as a marvelous creation direct from the Great Spirit. Then one day ill fortune overtakes the baby. A doctor is hurriedly summoned from the nearest settlement but arrives too late. The little life wavers in the balance a few hours and then slips silently across the great divide. With the death of the child all of the happiness in the little frontier home vanishes and when the tiny form is laid to rest at the foot of a tree that stands on a little hill overlooking the cabin, the desolation of the silent world creeps into the little home and nothing that Ned can do or say can allay the sorrow of the mother who has lost her baby.

Ned receives word a day or two later that he must journey to the distant settlement, there to complete the formalities in connection with title to his new home. In his absence Nellie becomes disconsolate. She sits by the empty cradle and dreams of the little one who had once occupied it. In her spirit of desolation she visits the tiny grave on the hillside and weeps as though her heart would break.

When all seems darkest to the grieving mother there suddenly appears to her a vision of the Christ. The Savior appears with a babe in his arms and his attitude reminds Nellie of the words "Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." Her arms still ache for something warm and young to hold and love, but the impression left upon her mind by the appearance of the Savior makes life more easy for her to live.

Meanwhile, an itinerant bootlegger supplies a band of Indians with a jug of whisky, which they drink with the usual consequences. Their blood inflamed by the fiery liquor, the Ned is summoned to the settlement.

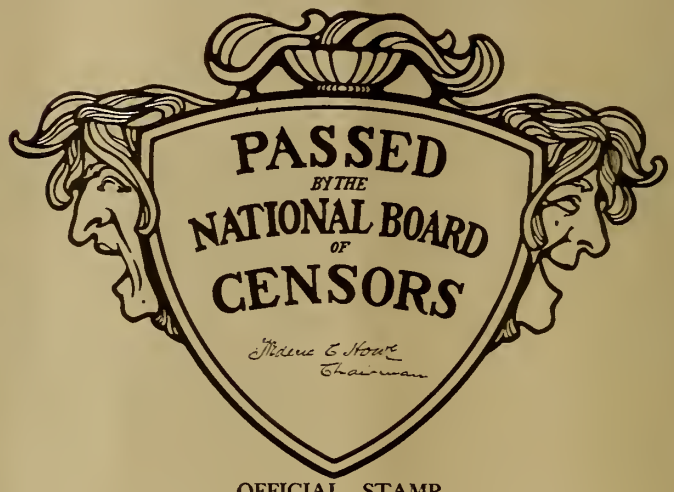
Indians set out upon a murderous mission and chancing upon a settler and his wife making their way slowly across the great plain in a prairie schooner, they attack the white people and, despite the heroic defense of the settler and his wife, kill both. A tiny baby, however, is buried in the canvas top of the wagon, when that is overturned, and the Indians, eager to be away on another bloody mission, overlook the babe in their haste to depart.

Ned Halton, returning from the settlement, is attracted by the sounds of the conflict and, waiting until the Indians have mounted their ponies and galloped away, he makes his way down to the burning schooner and there discovers the child alive and well, though badly frightened by the strange, evil faces it has beheld.

Taking the baby with him, Neds sets out for his home. Nellie has been sitting by the empty cradle, dreaming again of the little one snatched from her arms by death, but when she hears the stumbling footsteps of her husband she springs to the door and finds Ned almost dead from fatigue, for he has had a wild ride in order to escape from the Indians who so viciously and murderously attacked the passing settler and his wife.

A bootlegger supplies a band of Indians with whisky.

Nellie hastens to revive Ned and is amazed to discover the warm little bundle still clasped in his arms, for in all the struggles and hardships he has undergone Ned has unconsciously kept the baby from injury and harm. The joy of Nellie when she discovers the bundle is unbounded and she takes the little one in her arms and clasps it fondly to her breast with great tenderness. Once more the vision of the Savior appears and seems to bestow a blessing upon the tiny babe, rescued so miraculously from death, and upon the mother who once more has a little form to comfort and caress. Ned, recovering from his fatigue, beholds the happy spectacle of Nellie with a babe clasped in her arms and a smile of perfect happiness and contentment spreads over his face, for he deems it an augury of much happiness and success for the new home now their very own.



The cast for the production is as follows:

Nellie Halton	Bessie Eyeton
Ned Halton	Wheeler Oakman
Settler	Jack McDonald
His Wife	Gertrude Ryan
Bootlegger	Frank Clark
Indian Chief	Tom Mix
The Savior	Harry Lonsdale

Watch for New Insignia

The campaign against all forms of legalized censorship which is being inaugurated by the National Board of Censorship under the direction and management of J. W. Binder, is receiving the hearty support of all interested in the industry. During the past week the board has received assurances of support in its campaign from men who make raw stock, musical instruments, projection machines, screens, as well as from the largest manufacturers and exhibitors of motion pictures in the country. One of the largest theater managers associations in the country, speaking through its president, has not only endorsed the movement, but has also promised financial support.

The new insignia by which the board will register its approval of films is being very favorably received by all legitimate manufacturers. It will be used on films, passed by the board, from now on. The insignia is copyrighted and the signature of Chairman Frederic C. Howe, which appears on it, will make the unauthorized use of it a forgery punishable by law. This is a reproduction of the new seal:

OFFICIAL STAMP

One of the features of the board's campaign of education will be an advertising campaign to tell the general public just what this seal stands for when it appears on a picture. This will be done through the magazines and newspapers as well as through the trade press. In the advertisements the names of the concerns who habitually bring all of their pictures before the board for criticism will be printed, so that the public at large will be enabled to know who it is that makes high grade pictures. How these pictures are passed upon by the National board, what the standards of criticism are that are applied to them, and who the persons are that constitute the board will also be brought out in the advertisements.

One of the well known paintings woven into "The War of Wars," the photoplay of Ramo Films, Inc., the scenes of which are laid on the Franco-Belgian frontier at the outbreak of the present war, is "The Last Cartridge" of Alphonse de Neuville. This was exhibited in 1873 at the Paris Salon, and wone for the artists the cross of the Legion of Honor. "De Neuville had the genius of action," wrote a critic in the "Revue des Deux Mondes," and that is why his work blends so remarkably with the actual scenes of conflict portrayed in "The War of Wars."

BLISS MILFORD is a talented young actress with big blue eyes and a charming disposition. Her stage experience dates back to the time when, as a child, she overruled her father's objections and carried a flag in the picnic scene in "The County Chairman." George Marion, the stage director, was impressed by her earnestness and coached her in the line which was to be given to one of the little girls. Later she took a small part in a Stair & Havlin road production and the following year was made ingenue. Promotions and offers then followed in quick succession until she was soon appearing on Broadway. She created the role of Sally Ann in "The Candy Shop" and the titular role in "Sentimental Sally." Her advent into pictures was purely accidental. Living near the Edison studio she thought to fill in her time between seasons by taking extras, but liked the work so well she remained in it.

ARTHUR HOUSMAN, one of the foremost comedians of the screen to-day, has been a member of the Edison stock company for the past three and a half years. He was born in New York City, several years ago, he admits, but refuses to divulge the exact date, asserting that he is still very young. During his stage career he positively states that he has not been engaged solely in support of famous stars, but that at intervals he has appeared in popular successes which owe nothing in their construction to William Shakespeare. Mr. Housman does not owe his first appearance in the pictures to any demand on the part of the producers but, in his own words, "it just happened," and having no ambition to become a romantic leading man he has confined his efforts to comedy with such success that his appearance on the screen is always greeted with laughter. "The Guilded Kidd" is his latest.

Arthur Housman.

EDWARD EARLE was born in Toronto, Canada, and it was in a little town near there that he started on the theatrical career which has eventually led him to the Edison stock company. Some of the well known plays in which he scored on the legitimate stage are "The Matinee Idol," with De Wolf Hopper; "The Boys and Betty," with Marie Cahill; "Sweet Kitty Bellairs," with Henrietta Crossman, and "The Blue Moon," with James T. Powers. Although Mr. Earle has been identified with the Edison company but a short time his congenial ways and versatility have won for him the friendship and admiration of all the members of the company. He is perfectly at ease before the camera, as is shown by his characterizations in "The Unopened Letter," "The Hand of Horror," "The Mystery of the Fadless Tints," and "Sheep's Clothing." His acting is natural and unrestrained.

Edward Earle.

VIOLA DANA just couldn't help being a star, not that she had anything to say about it, but because stars are born and not made. At the age of 6, Miss Dana, then a wee morsel of loveliness, made her debut in the theatrical profession and less than twelve years of varied experience and associations with Broadway's most prominent stars enabled her to conceive the artistic creation of "Gwendolyn" in Miss Eleanor Gates' most recent Broadway success, "The Poor Little Rich Girl." Then came a happy thought and with apologies to Shakespeare, she quoted: "Not that I love the stage less, but I love the pictures more"; and with the same zeal that gave her rating among "theatrical stars" she entered in the profession of shadows and lights and already the seeds of stardom have taken deep root. One of her latest screen successes is "The Blind Fiddler." She is now with Edison.

THE NEW HOME OF THE LIBERTY MOTION PICTURE COMPANY.

New Company in the Quaker City

Modern Plant Erected

TO achieve the best results in the motion picture industry necessitates that only the very best methods may be used—and this the Liberty Motion Picture Company, in which a number of wealthy Philadelphians are interested, had in view when the plans were completed for the erection of its model motion picture plant,, which is now situated at 20-52 East Herman street, Germantown, Philadelphia.

The officers and founders of the company are John Axford, president; Howard G. Bobb, vice-president and general manager; Albert E. Hindle, secretary and treasurer; Charles D. Greener, studio manager; and J. E. Overton, laboratory chief.

All took an active part in planning the studio and as a result the studio shows perfection in every detail. In the large developing room there are eight developing tanks and eight washing tanks, the latter serving to stop the active developer. The film is then placed on an overhead rail and sent into the hypo room. Here there are eight large tanks, in addition two preliminary water tanks, in which the film is dipped after it has gone through the hypo process.

The film is then sent into the wash room where the frames are immersed in large washing tanks. In this room, two hundred and twenty frames of film can be washed and drained at one time. The water used in this process is purified before entering the wash-room. The enormous drying room can hold six hundred and thirty frames of film at one time. It contains an indirect air system, which keeps the purified dry air in circulation at all times. Frames of films can be dried in this room in about one hour and twenty minutes. The dry room also contains a special compartment for the exclusive use of negative film.

The negative room, where negatives are inspected, polished, matched, and prepared for the printing room, is in charge of ten girls. The printing room, when completed, will contain sixty printing machines and four perforators. The chemical room, in which the developer and hypo are mixed, contains five large tanks. Pipes run direct from this room to the developing and hypo rooms, where if more developer is needed it may be secured by turning on a spigot. Experimental work also is done in this room.

The projecting room has a capacity for seven machines, six with small screens, and one for large screen. Adjacent to the projecting room lies the shipping room which contains all the modern shipping methods.

All the rooms are in direct communication with one another which makes it possible to carry films from one room to the other without placing them in sealed boxes.

The factory is under the personal supervision of J. E. Overton, who has been in the photographic business practically all his life. He is a graduate chemist and has had considerable experience in the technical end of motion pictures.

In the studio, there is adequate space for sixteen good size sets, five electric stages are now in preparation. On the studio floor there are photographer's dark rooms and property rooms. The carpenter shop and paint frame are located on the floor below the studio and everything is shipped to the studio on the elevator which runs from the main floor to the fourth. The dressing rooms for the actors and actresses are large and airy. They contain hot and cold running water, rugs, electricity for curling irons, and make-up tables.

Charles D. Greener, who is manager of the production department, is a man of long theatrical standing. He started his career with the Primrose & West minstrels a number of years ago, and later drifted into the mechanical end of the show business where he remained for some time. Later, as manager of his own productions, Mr. Greener toured the country. It was at that time, that he became affiliated with the general manager, Howard G. Bobb, both being foremost in the formation of the present company.

The officers of the company, the studio manager, publicity department, producers, scenario department. wardrobe room, and green room are all located on the second floor of the building.

The Liberty Company has purchased, for use in western and rural pictures a two hundred and thirty-seven acre estate that is located at Harmonville, Pa. which will hereafter be known as Libertyville. It is a thirty-five minute motor run from the studio proper to Libertyville. On this estate is found live stock of almost every description, as well as a variety of locations which include farms, quarries, hills, valleys, woods, deer ponds, a stone cliff ninety feet in height, a battle field and a western village.

General Manager Howard G. Bobb, who is responsible for much of the excellent work being done at the plant, gained his knowledge of the motion picture business in a very peculiar manner. Resigning his position as president of a prominent Philadelphia pharmaceutical company, he secured a minor position in a motion picture laboratory where he studied the film business. He remained there until he acquired the technical end of the game. Later he interested a number of wealthy Philadelphians and with the aid of Charles Greener, J. E. Overton, A. E. Hindle, and John Axford started the Liberty Company.

Albert E. Hindle, secretary and treasurer of the concern, is employed in the same capacity with three other prominent corporations in the Quaker City.

The Liberty company has in its stock company a number of well known professionals, the list including Frances Cummings, Edward B. LaRenz, Charles T. Danforth, E. B. Tilton, Katherine Bjorling, Robert Ingrahm, Elizabeth Bjorling, Frank McLellen, Joseph J. Kelly, Irene Kingsland and Jack Shultz. N. E. Milligan is the chief director and has the company hard at work on a number of multiple-reel photoplays.

Frances Bertini Stars in Kleine Film

Frances Bertini, the Charming Italian actress who is featured in the next Kleine release through the feature department of the General Film Company, entitled "The Woman Who Dared," has seldom been seen to better advantage. The story calls for heavy emotional acting under the most trying circumstances, for during the third and fourth reels of this five reel subject she is required to wear a mask most of the time and all the impressions she registers are the result of her general carriage and the twitching of her mouth.

The other players are all cast for roles of minor importance, but do very well in the dramatic scenes with Miss Bertini. The settings are very beautiful and the photography clear and even. The story itself is filled with interesting situations and incidents and the climax is led up to in a convincing manner.

The opening scenes of the play are laid in the home of Count Bertrand, an army officer, who is highly estemed by his superiors because of the military genius he has exhibited. With his wife he is continually helping the poor, and when a society circus is suggested to raise funds for slum work they readily agree to finance it. Countess Bertrand secures Ivanhoff, supposedly a circus director, but really a secret service man of another nation, to assist in planning the affair.

Ivanhoff receives orders to get the plans for some important military movements to be made by the army which Count Bertrand is connected with and succeeds in doing this after drugging the count while talking over the coming social affair. Ivanhoff then hurries to his own country with his wife, who has served as his accomplice.

Count Bertrand cannot account for the disappearance of the plans and is sentenced to twelve years in prison after a one-sided court martial. The countess is heartbroken but bravely determines to free her husband, who she knows is innocent. As she is an expert horseback rider and secures a position in the famous hippodrome in the city where Ivanhoff has taken up his residence. She wears a mask continually, however, and refuses to divulge her identity.

Ivanhoff has Countess Bertrand arrested.

Ivanhoff quarrels with his wife and deserts her. She becomes an actress in a wandering circus.

The mysterious rider draws Ivanhoff to the hippodrome and he becomes infatuated with her. The countess finds his wife and learns that Ivanhoff stole the plans. She then uses her mask to lead him on and finally secures the plans from him, and after disclosing her identity, makes her escape. Through the influence of his official position he has her arrested before she can reach her own country and takes the papers away from her.

The countess returns home heartbroken and fears that her attempt to save her husband has been futile but Alexis, a faithful servant who has been with her throughout the trouble, brings a letter to her which she dropped from the plans and which furnishes the proof necessary to clear the count's name and free him from imprisonment.

Thrilling Ramo War Drama

The belfry of Grandpre, depicted in "The War of Wars," the latest photoplay of Ramo Films, Inc., was modeled in miniature on the belfry of Bruges, made famous by Longfellow's poem. Soon after the company's photographer filmed it, a shell destroyed it. He returned to Grandpre to find it in ruins. The priest, stone dead, still knelt before his altar. The atmphosphere of "The War of Wars" is the atmosphere created by Guy de Maupassant, the French novelist, with his landscapes and characters, country roads bordered with apple trees, farm interiors, market places, taverns, weddings, christenings, funerals and the whole population of sons of the soil country squires, farmers, farmer's daughters, all this joy instantly changed to gloom by the coming war.

Scene from Ramo's "War of Wars," at Grandpre near Nancy, France.

Hang Town Rejuvenated

A feature of interest which the California Motion Picture Corporation has incorporated into its film dramatization of Bret Harte's "Salomy Jane" will be a rejuvenation of Hang Town, the most famous and characteristic of the early mining samps of the Far West. The settlement in the late 40's and the 50's teemed with all the outlawry, violence and reckless bravado that called the celebrated vigilantes into existence. The organization effected by these self ordained guardians of law and order plays a very large part in the story.

A New Style of Films

On Saturday, September 19, "The Reward of Thrift," in two parts, will be released in the regular service through the General exchanges. This picture, which was produced by the Vitagraph Company, with the co-operation of the American Bankers' Association, will be an event maker in the history of filmdom.

C. J. Hite Killed in Auto Accident

All Filmdom Mourns

MEMBERS of the film industry the country over were shocked to learn on Saturday morning, August 22, that C. J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, first vice-president and treasurer of the Mutual Film Corporation, a director and stockholder in many other large motion picture concerns, and one of filmdom's most prominent notables, had on Friday night plunged off the viaduct at One Hundred and Fifty-fifth street, New York City, in his high-powered automobile, and died as the result of his injuries at 5 o'clock Saturday morning at the Harlem Hospital.

The car plunged off the bridge and landed, bottom up, fifty feet below, pinning Mr. Hite beneath the wreckage. The Thanhouser president was still conscious when found, however, and was able to give his name and address and to request that the Ten Eyck Club at New Rochelle be notified and some member of the club be asked to communicate with Mrs. Hite.

Charles Jackson Hite.

Writing of the accident a New York newspaper of Saturday morning says:

"The machine, its steering gear apparently deranged, smashed into the railing along the bridge and cut through it as though it were paper. Eight feet of the railing was torn away. The machine fell into the grounds of the Manhattan Casino, its rear being tilted against a fifteen-foot fence separating the Manhattan's summer garden from that of the Central Casino.

"The accident was seen by Robert Walters of 304 West One Hundred and Forty-seventh street, and the crash through the railing was heard to the further end of the viaduct. Policeman McMahon ran to Mr. Hite's assistance. He was tangled in the wreckage, it was difficult to get him out.

"The inexplicable feature of the accident is how the motor car, unless at tremendous speed, could have carried away the viaduct railing. This is of iron, four and a half feet high and built of lattice an inch in thickness. At the top of the lattice is an iron rail nine inches in circumference. The iron posts supporting it are ten inches square and bedded and bolted into the concrete walk. But Mr. Hite's machine carried away one of these posts and eight feet of the lattice.

"Only the engine, steering post and top hamper of the car were damaged. The wheels were not injured and the car was towed on its running gear first to the Lenox avenue police station and afterward to a garage at No. 147 West One Hundred and Twenty-seventh street." Pedestrians and many of the patrons of the Central Amusment Casino, who witnessed the accident, made desperate efforts to release the imprisoned man from beneath the body of the machine. Several patrolmen and ambulance surgeons who were called to the scene of the accident were unable to free him until jacks were brought from the nearby elevated shops.

As soon as the car was lifted Mr. Hite lost consciousness. He was hurried to the Harlem Hospital, where his injuries were found to include fracture of the skull, compound fracture of the jaw, which was broken into small pieces within the muscles, fracture of the left ribs, and rupture of the femoral artery.

Mr. Hite was the sole occupant of his high-powered roadster, which he was driving east on his way to cross the bridge to the Bronx and thence to his home in New Rochelle, the old Francis Wilson estate in Meadow Lane, when the accident occurred. It is believed that the slippery pavements, still wet from the recent thunderstorm, made the car skid as it started to turn the corner. One eye-witness said that the film man attempted to leap from the machine as he saw the impending danger, but he was unable to worm his way out from beneath the steering gear before the car rammed the iron railing of the viaduct and crashed over the edge, carrying with it a section of the ironwork which borders the bridge. According to one report Mr. Hite deliberately drove his machine over the sidewalk to avoid running down a child who had stepped off a Bronx car and was crossing the tracks in the direct path of his car.

Although only thirty-nine years of age at the time of his death Mr. Hite had already written his name high up on filmdom's scroll of fame and was recognized as one of those who have made motion pictures an art and an industry of wide importance. From owner of a small film exchange, Mr. Hite in seven years had developed into one of America's best known film magnates.

Born in Fairfield county, Ohio, of old Virginia stock, C. J. Hite after the usual course of a country boy at the district school, attended the Ohio Central Normal College and after three years there became a teacher. His summer vacations were spent doing newspaper work. A few years later he gave up teaching to go into mercantile business in Bremen, Ohio, and in turn, left this field to begin lyceum work. When motion pictures made their appearance Mr. Hite was ready to meet the new amusement more than half way and he probably was the first man to utilize the cinematograph in connection with a lyceum bureau. In 1906 he organized the C. J. Hite Moving Picture Company and supplied the lyceum bureaus with reels of film. Two years later he moved to Chicago and established a film exchange there, Mr. Hite himself being the whole force, both day and night shifts. As a result of overwork he soon found himself in ill health and one day called a physician that he had known since early boyhood. Instead of leaving a prescription the doctor left a check. That physician was Dr. Wilbur Shallenberger. And so, with proper financing, Mr. Hite commenced the career which made him famous and wealthy.

A short time later he went into partnership with Samuel S. Hutchinson and the organization was named the H. & H. Film Service Company. New exchanges were opened in Detroit, Des Moines and other middle western cities and then the Majestic Film Exchange, one of the most remunerative of all, was formed.

With a fortune made in this way, Mr. Hite invaded New York about three years ago and shortly after his arrival it was announced that he had secured not only the control but practically all of the stock of the Thanhouser Film Corporation of New Rochelle. At the same time Mr. Hite retained his interest in the American Film Manufacturing Company of which S. S. Hutchinson, his former partner, was president. With H. E. Aitkin and other western men, Mr. Hite became interested in the Majestic Motion Picture Company, when that concern was treated in what was regarded as an unfair manner by the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company.

In seeking a chain of exchanges of their own and an independent market, the Mutual Film Corporation was formed, which as everyone knows is now one of the greatest film distributing agencies in the country. Among the last achievements of Mr. Hite's life was the formation of the Syndicate Film Corporation to market the famous "Million Dollar Mystery" films, and the financing of the recent film expedition to the Bahamas, which, working with the invention of A. E. Williamson, obtained the most remarkable submarine pictures ever filmed.

Funeral services were held at Mr. Hite's late home, the former Francis Wilson residence, Meadow Lane, New Rochelle, on Tuesday afternoon, August 25, at 2:30 o'clock, the Rev. Charles Canedy of the New Rochelle Episcopal church officiating.

In addition to his parents, who reside in Lancaster, Ohio, Mr. Hite is survived by three sisters, two unmarried who live in Lancaster, and Mrs. W. Ray Johnston, who has been visiting at New Rochelle for some months; four brothers, Claude, Leo, Joseph and Guy, and a widow and two children.

C. J. Hite was most highly respected, loved and admired by all with whom he came in contact and all filmdom unites in extending sincere sympathy to the bereaved family and relatives in this their time of sorrow.

Miss Lillian Drew, who has been seriously ill at a Madison, Wis., hospital, is recovering rapidly and expects to be back at the Essanay studio within a short time.

Has Reviewer Discovered New Star?

A week or two ago a MOTOGRAPHY reviewer commented favorably upon the appearance of a new ingenue in "At the End of a Perfect Day," an American two-reel feature, but could not name the actress as neither the press sheet nor the Chicago manager of the "Flying A" was at that time in possession of her name. Last week the picture in question was exhibited at Santa Barbara, California, at the Palace theater, and Paul Gyllstrom, press agent of the Palace, used MOTOGRAPHY's review quite extensively in advertising the picture. Thinking that readers of MOTOGRAPHY would be interested in learning more of the actress in question, Mr. Gyllstrom supplies a photograph which is reproduced herewith, and writes as follows: "Victoria Thompson is her name and in Santa Barbara this clever little ingenue is referred to as 'MOTOGRAPHY's find.' She made her only appearance in 'At the End of a Perfect Day' and was without previous stage experience. Miss Thompson is a high school girl, sixteen years of age, and but one of several Santa Barbara girls who have been appearing as 'extras' in American films. It was because of her beauty and intelligence that Director Tom Ricketts chose her for a more important role. Victoria is an orphan who up to a few weeks ago had been living with her grandmother. The grandmother knew of her appearance in pictures and was looking forward to seeing her grandchild's appearance on the screen, in the hope that her ward had done well, but between the time the picture was produced and the day it was released the grandmother died. Victoria now lives with an aunt. At this time there are no definite plans for her future, other than that she shall continue her high school studies, though the attention MOTOGRAPHY called to her may have its influence."

Victoria Thompson.

Evelyn Thaw in Pictures

Evelyn Nesbit Thaw is the latest recruit to the motion picture field. Mrs. Thaw can be seen daily these hot days dividing her time betwen the Lubin studio in Philadelphia and Betzwood and nearby country and seashore resorts, where she is completing the five reel dramatic story entitled, "Threads of Destiny." Fred Mace, the well known comedian and moving picture man, has Mrs. Thaw under contract, and under a special arrangement with Siegmund Lubin will present her to the public. Mr. Mace and Joseph W. Smiley are jointly producing "Threads of Destiny," and incidentally Mr. Smiley is playing one of the greatest roles of his picture career as the chief of the Russian Secret Police.

Gaumont Studio a Wonderful Place

By William T. Braun

Mr. Braun, author of the article on this page, had arranged with the house of Gaumont for a number of photographs with which to illustrate his story, but the beginning of hostilities in Europe naturally has prevented the mailing of the photographs so we have to offer the story unillustrated. In explaining the absence of photos Mr. Braun wrote: "Everything is closed in Paris on account of martial law and all the shopkeepers have joined the army. Only Americans are seen about the Opera and we probably will have to stay here until we get transports. We are attending some cinema shows, but as Grand Opera held in the open air in the Jardin of the Tuilleries costs less than one-third the price of the movies, most Americans are attending the Opera."—(Editor.)

THE display rooms and city offices of the Societe des Establissements Gaumont are, like other good things in Paris, near the world-famous Paris Grand Opera House. On the main floor of the building are the extensive photographic display rooms where the finest photographs of Paris and France are displayed. Upon entering the office of the cinematographic department on the third floor and declaring our ignorance of the French language an interpreter is immediately obtained and we are shown about.

M. Gaumont is called up at the works and he assures us that he will be pleased to show us through the plant. A half hour ride on the subway brings us to the pretty Parc des Buttes Clammont on the outskirts of Paris. From the heights a good view of "Elge City," as the works are known, can be had. Glass covered studios, shops, office buildings, power plant, all form a small city in itself of three and one-half acres, while across the road another film factory has just been completed. Entering one of the numerous gates, we are directed to the reception room, where one of the journalists who acts as an interpreter conducts us to M. Gaumont's private office.

M. Leon Gaumont is waiting for us and immediately takes us to the large studio building. Fortunately a scene is just being taken. Contrary to the usual custom the producer is sitting quietly in a chair but his keen eye takes in everything.

The scene is taken three times before all is satisfactory. We then walk across the huge studio, or theater, as it is called on that side of the Atlantic, to the storage room. Here tier after tier of scenery is orderly stored. Then down below to the furniture storage. The furniture is in a surprisingly good condition for studio use and any of it could be placed with credit in a private home. M. Gaumont assures us that all the properties must be kept in an excellent state of repair. The costume storage room is then visited. Here all of the elaborate French costumes so well known in the Gaumont pictures are kept.

The carpentry and scene painters' studios, with the new building just completed, where immense pieces are constructed by talented scene painters, is next visited.

The large power plant of 1,000 horsepower capacity was our next stop. All the power used in the whole plant is developed here. An addition which will double the capacity of the plant is almost completed. A walk through one of the pipe tunnels, through which power is transmitted, brings us into the machine shop. Here, in a large, light shop, is made the Gaumont projector or "Chrono," as it is called. The entire projector with the exception of the lens, is made here. Adjoining the machine shop is the sheet metal shop, where lamp houses are made, the foundry where castings are poured, and the store rooms where large quantities of the separate parts, finished or in the rough, are kept. The Gaumont camera is also made here.

M. Gaumont then asks us whether we have seen his talking pictures and natural color films. When we confess our ignorance he first takes us into the studio where talking pictures are taken. Separate studios are provided for the talking and natural color pictures. At one side of the talking picture studio are the phonograph receiving horns, four in number. A piano and other musical instruments are at hand in this studio, which is as large as the buildings which many companies use for their main studios.

We are next conducted to the exhibition theater, where M. Gaumont promises to show us some of his latest talking pictures. The first picture is that of a rooster crowing. It is difficult enough to get a rooster to crow when wanted, but this one is very obliging and the phonograph concealed behind the curtain gives us the sounds just as distinctly as we hear them in the wee small hours and at the precise instant when Mr. Rooster opens his bill. The synchronism and the rendition is perfect. We are next treated to a few selections on the banjo, rendered by Burtearl, the famous American banjo player. These are very good and his explanations at the beginning of each selection are quite distinct, none of the usual rasp of the phonograph being heard.

The Gaumont establishment is now making a large number of Russian pictures, and we are treated to the national air of South Russia rendered by a famous soloist, accompanied by an orchestra; also a short film showing the difficulties of a Russian gentleman in getting the correct party on the telephone, and I am sure if we could have understood Russian we could have added quite a few forcible words to our vocabulary judging from his rendition and expression.

We are next conducted to an elaborately fitted up exhibition theater, where we are promised a treat in natural color pictures. We are first shown some fine dishes of various fruits, and in spite of having just had a large dinner, our mouths water at the sight of the fine grapes, strawberries, peaches, etc. The coloring certainly is perfect, the most famous artist could not have done better. Scenery and village life in Algiers and Spain follow and the highly colored scenes of these tropical climates certainly are well depicted. Scenes with fast riding and swiftly moving objects are then presented. They are very clear and no fringes of color on the outlines of the objects are visible.

The greater part of M. Gaumont's time is taken up in perfecting the talking and natural color pictures and he assures us that he is not satisfied with his present results, but is trying to combine his color and talking pictures, which certainly will be a crowning achievement to anyone. But when the results that he has accomplished so far are seen and the fact that he has steadily improved his product for the past twenty years is recalled it does not seem impossible for him to accomplish what all cinematograph companies are striving for.

He assures us that we are the first Americans to whom he has given an exhibition of his latest works and we certainly appreciate it. M. Gaumont, like most of the successful men of the film industry, is on the job all the time, personally superintending as much of the work as is possible for him, and the whole plant centers around his activity.

In 1893 he was a comparatively unknown electrical engineer and acting as director to a company manufacturing photographic apparatus. Naturally interested in all photographic developments, M. Gaumont was attracted by the successes and failures of the experiments being made by Messrs. Lumiere & Sons and Messrs. J. DeMarey and G. de Demeney. A keen observer, he almost immediately realized the immense possibilities of the cinematograph and gramophone, and in 1894 acquired the Demeney patent.

The idea appealed to him and he set to work to manufacture, in a small way of course, the projector to which he gave the name of the "Chrono." From that beginning sprang the business which today has a world wide fame. Success quickly followed M. Gaumont's early efforts and a limited company, known as the "Societe des Etablissements Gaumont" was created with an original capital of $600,000. Each successive advance, and these are continuous, is paid for out of profits. Thus the business has developed without a weight of interest, the drag which fetters so many companies. The Gaumont company has been built up by the industry of a man working hard himself, secured by his urbanity and straight dealing and the assistance of men who nobly seconded his efforts.

After spending an entire afternoon with a busy man who unselfishly gave up his time to show two Americans through his wonderful plant, we bid him "bon soir" and return to Paris to get ready to spend a pleasant evening with another famous Gaumont institution, the Gaumont Palace, the largest motion picture theater in the world.

This imposing building, which formerly was a hippodrome in which 1,500 performers had acted before 8,000 spectators, was opened to cinematography on September 29, 1911. It is situated on the Boulevard de Clichy near the Moulin Rouge. The monumental facade of marble columns and iron gates is crowned by a dome. A wide staircase leads from the vestibule into the auditorium, the entrance to the galleries being at the sides of the building. The orchestra accommodates 1,750, there are twenty-four loges each with four seats and a promenade accommodating 1500; the balconies seat 1800, and the galleries 1500, making a total of almost 7000 seats. The seats are comfortable, roomy and pitched at a greater angle than 60°, thus making it possible for every spectator to get a good view of the immense screen measuring 24 feet by 32 feet. Suspended from the dome are 20 arc lamps each of 6,000 candle power. The entrance is illuminated by 6 arc lamps, 1000 lamps are used on the main staircase, while the screen is encircled with 500 lamps and 800 more light the superb architectural designs of the Palace. The total lighting represents 370,000 candle power. The lighting is furnished by 3 dynamos worked by steam engines which can each produce a current of 1,500 amperes at 110 volts. Three boilers are used to furnish power for lighting, while a fourth is used to heat the building. A large switchboard in the machine hall controls the entire current furnished by the machines and also the supply of electricity taken from the public mains. Twelve large feeders distribute the energy throughout the building.

The operators' room, offices, etc., are lighted by means of current direct from the switchboard. A branch feeder controlling 600 lights in various parts of the house and corridors is sufficient to supply light for the whole building in case of a breakdown of the normal lights.

If for any reason the boiler ceases to work the heating can be taken over by one of the three generators. Heat is distributed by means of six circuits which, starting from the heating chamber, spread in all directions. The batteries which encircle the theater form a special circuit fed by pipes. The air gathered by them is heated and distributed free from impurities by means of the six openings in the theater. On the coldest days the amount of coal used is estimated at 5 tons. Heat is produced under a pressure of 13 pounds and about 3 miles of piping have been used. A large empty space between the main roof and the theater furnishes good protection from the heat of sun's rays in summer.

The projection of the picture is unique. It is projected from a separate room 105 feet in back of the curtain across the old hippodrome stage. Thus the audience is in complete safety as far as danger from film ignition is concerned and the cone of the trail of light is avoided which is always so noticeable in direct projection. Thus the illusion is made more complete.

The operator's department comprises two rooms, one for projection and one for rewinding the films. Metal film cases and a glass covered table for patching forms the apparatus in the rewinding room. The operating room is high, well ventilated, and equipped with three projection machines about six feet apart. Water tanks are placed between the film and condenser to absorb the heat of the light rays. Portable fire extinguishers and a tank above the film magazine complete the fire precautions in the booth.

Throughout the entire building exceptional precaution is taken in regard to fire. Hose, pails, hatchets and fire guards are stationed in various parts of the house. Emergency exit corridors, with doors the full width, make it possible to empty the entire audience of 7000 people in less than four minutes.

The employes consist of a box office chief and four assistants, 30 ushers, 20 supervisors, the electrical and mechanical departments employ about 25 men, there being four operators; in all there are nearly 200 employes in the Gaumont Palace.

The evening performance begins at 8:30 and lasts three hours with two intervals of ten minutes. Matinees are run on Sundays, holidays and a special matinee on Thursdays when appropriate pictures are shown for schools and colleges. An orchestra of forty, under an able director provides the musical part of the programme. Frequently the projection of special features is accompanied by a large chorus as well as the orchestra. CENSORING WAR FILMS

A CERTAIN California newspaper recently came out with an editorial in large type, two columns wide, giving several "Reasons for Censoring the Movies War Films." These are the so-called reasons:

There is a disposition in many of the larger cities of the country to censor what are called "war films" in the moving picture shows.

The reason is obvious.

The population of the United States is heterogeneous beyond that of any other country on earth; there are thousands of Europeans in this country whose passions are wildly excited over the conditions now existing in their native lands; they are human enough to forget that they are living in a country where these things do not affect us as they would if brought to our own doors; consequently they resent everything that antagonizes their national prejudices.

It is but natural that the representation on the screens of the moving pictures of incidents that are humiliating to their national pride or insulting to their affection for the fatherland, should rouse them to anger, nor that they should give active expression of their feelings.

The danger of such expression in a crowded assembly where opposite opinions are as fierce as those uttered is too clear to admit of debate.

The actual legality of such censorship upon films likely to create riot and panic in the moving picture house need not be considered by the municipal authorities whose first consideration is the safety of the multitude and the preservation, perhaps, of the lives of women and children which would be in imminent peril in the event of a clash between the factions of spectators incited to violence by the pictures on the screen.

It would seem that the owners of the picture houses would be willing for the protection of their personal interests to submit to a wise and proper censorship in this particular.

A riot in a moving picture house over the scenes displayed there would certainly ruin the future business of that house, especially if innocent spectators were injured in the ensuing panic.

It is better to take the precaution proposed than to regret the consequences of the neglect.

No doubt a warning from the proper authorities would be sufficient; but if it is not the application of a sort of martial law in the premises may be imperative.

We can't afford to encourage tumult of this kind in this country over matters that do not concern us as American citizens.

There is nothing to show whether this "calamity howl" is aimed at real war topicals, or at studio war dramas. We have no disposition to protect the latter from the customary supervision of the National Board of Censorship, which has always been absolutely fair and equitable. For the manufactured war drama, being originally conceived in the imagination of a producer or script writer, and not on any battlefield, needs examination as much as any drama of peace; perhaps more.

But the idea of censoring any topical of the war, unless it should record directly scenes of personal inhumanity and brutality, is as ridiculous as it would be to censor the pictures printed in the newspaper press.

Newspaper war bulletins are very carefully censored at their source, it is true; but that is solely for the preservation of military secrecy, and not at all for the moral protection of the newspaper readers. Nothing, indeed, is too gruesome or brutal for the press; yet it is not apparent that those dispatches which do get through are arousing any racial feeling in this country.

There seems to be a peculiar misunderstanding of the exciting causes of racial feeling. Race burlesque or comedy, dramatic misrepresentation, may and often do arouse race protest. Facts never do. News of pictures showing the victories or defeat of any nation cause joy or sorrow—not belligerency.

The heterogeneous races of people that go to make up America all are stricken with awe and grief that their fatherlands must shed each other's best blood. In the world's greatest calamity there is no room for personal antagonism. The great cry of the people of this country is for news—anything that will give them the facts of the big encounter. The newspapers can get little; and what they do get is made up of rumor, unofficial report and the remnants of military censorship. The bare possibility that the camera-men at the front may manage somehow to send actual pictures of the conflict to this shore is the greatest hope of those whose hearts are wrung by the terrible uncertainty.

We have said often that we did not approve of official censorship of motion pictures in any form. But we will not argue that point now. If the authorities must censor, let them examine the war dramas that are manufactured; but hands off the only intimate representation of this terrible history that we can hope to get—the rare work of the death-defying, hardship-enduring, danger-ridden cameraman at the front.

GERMAN FILM GAME DEPRESSED.

That the motion picture situation in Germany is far from satisfactory, without even considering the added complications due to the war now in progress, is illustrated in an item which has only recently been received by the International News Service, dealing with conditions as they were before the commencement of hostilities. It reads as follows:

Political and a certain amount of industrial unrest, added to the rigid demands of the censor have hit the moving picture business in Germany a blow that has proved a knockout to hundreds of hitherto prosperous concerns. The theaters and the film factories alike have been hard hit. The strike of the producers against the new police censorship fee of 25 cents for every 20 meters of film manufactured is still going on, but it is acknowledged that several manufacturers are evading the strike agreement by having their products censored through the theater owners, so that they need not appear in the matter themselves.

At the moment the indications are that the film manufacturers will finally cave in and pay the tax out of their diminishing profits, a sort of compromise by compulsion. Meanwhile the cinematograph theaters are beginning to close their doors under the strain of increased taxation combined with declining patronage. Some of these establishments in Berlin pay as much as $25,000 a year in the form of the municipal "amusement" tax. The newer and larger ones have been gotten up to outvie Solomon's Temple in the splendor of their hangings, panelings and illumination, and with reduced prices and higher taxes have a hard time to live. Without the 20 cents charged for checking your hat and coat (which must be given up), most of the theaters could not live at all. It is significant that one of the largest foreign film-making firms operating in Berlin has halved its prices at a stroke.

IN MEMORIAM.

There has just passed from among us a man who, in the brief space of six years, rose to pre-eminence in the councils of our trade; who, in the stress and strain of that great achievement, never forgot to be a staunch friend, a considerate employer, a man and a gentleman. For the fame and fortune that he took from the motion picture he returned more than a fair equivalent. We shall miss him sorely; for our industry has found few men like Charles Jackson Hite.

Just A Moment Please

Right off the bat, Ye Editor wants to threaten his associate, C. R. C., with sudden death if he shoots us any more still pictures like the one of the Eclectic elephant retreating in "Bungling Bunk's Bunco." It comes pretty close to taking the prize for the world's worst still picture. If Jumbo had been "coming" instead of "going," it might not have been so bad—but "going"—it's impossible. Friend Schafer has suggested running it over the caption "Meet Me Face to Face," but even then we don't believe it would pass the Censor Board.

"Oh goody, here's another Pauline picture."
"Wish those folks would sit down, I can't see a thing."
"Isn't Bunny just too funny for anything."
"Me for these Keystone comedies all the while."
"I'll bet those war pictures are faked. It can't be possible they've got real pictures of the fighting in Europe this soon."

Speaking of pictures, reminds us that we have the honor to offer our readers this week a striking likeness of our old friend Ben Beadell. No, Ben didn't realize he was going to break into print this way, or perhaps he would have chosen a different pose. Anyway, the picture shows the world's champion caster engaged in "still" fishing. Attention is also called to the fact that the piscatorial pole which has long been the envy of John Rock, Al Haase and other Izaak Waltons (hope that's the right name) is clearly shown in this picture. We guess this squares up any old scores we may have had to settle with Ben, so, for the present, and in order to avoid prematurely cashing in on our life insurance policy, we'll "lay off."

Eclectic Picture Leaves One Guessing

Film Ends Dramatically

THE twelfth episode of "The Perils of Pauline" is absolutely essential if one would wish to understand or appreciate the thirteenth release. Hitherto the episodes have stood on their own merits on the strength of a new thrill, or a complete adventure, but this one is worked out on a different plan.

It leads us through a kidnaping scene, pictures some good views of a Gypsy camp and exciting fight and rescue scenes, but right at the crucial moment—one of those kind of suspenses when the breaking down of the projection machine would throw everybody out of their seats—an insert tells us that the big thrill has been postponed until the next release, some two weeks away. It is safe to say that since the beginning of the series no one scene has contained more pent-up curiosity and fear for Pauline's safety than the last scene in this episode in which the heroine admires and fondles a basket of flowers in which a rattlesnake has been hidden.

Pauline is made prisoner in the Gypsy camp.

Owing to her misunderstanding Harry's reason for preventing her attending her friend's wedding Pauline refuses to make up with him and tells him he is foolish and unjust in suspecting Owen of plotting against her. Harry receives his scolding in silence, then points out an article in the morning's paper and leaves her. Pauline is horrified by the account of the breaking up of the wedding to which she had been invited. It seems that in some unaccountable manner the lions' cage door became opened and the beasts rushed in on the party who were dining.

She seeks out Harry and begs his forgiveness In the meantime Owen visits the lion tamer who has returned to his Gypsy home and bribes him to kidnap Pauline. Later, an old Gypsy meets Pauline and induces her to have her fortune told. In consenting Pauline walks directly into Owen's trap. While seated by the road, having her palm read, she is attacked and carried off by some wicked-looking men.

When Harry returns he is alarmed by Pauline's disappearance and sets out in search of her. On the road he meets a girl from the Gypsy camp. In answer to his questions the girl, prompted by jealousy, tells of Pauline being brought into the camp by her lover and offers to lead him to the place if he will agree to thrash the kidnaper. Harry makes the promise and is soon actively engaged keeping it. A well-aimed bottle puts his opponent out of the fight and he and While her fortune was being told, evil men crept about her.

Pauline immediately make their way back home.

Now that her wish has been fulfilled, the Gypsy girl is sorry for her lover and vows vengeance on the former captive. In accordance with her idea of revenge she conceals a rattlesnake in a basket, covers it over with wild flowers and leaves it with the butler to be delivered to Pauline.

The butler carries the gift into the drawing room in which Harry and his adopted sister are seated.

The kidnapers threaten Pauline with death.

Delighted at receiving such fragrant flowers, Pauline picks several of the top ones and then reaches down to take them all out when—that is where the film leaves one gasping for breath.

A FILM much above the ordinary production is offered by the Eclectic company in its three-reel feature "In the Lions' Den," now being released. It is cleverly plotted and differs from the every day offering inasmuch as its ending does not leave the principal characters, their friends and relatives all well supplied with happiness, wealth and sweethearts or whatever other motive might have incited their actions. The ending is thrilling and tragic, but not disappointing, because it comes as a natural sequence to the events of the story.

The film is artistically colored and a real pleasure in itself aside from the interest aroused by the story it tells. It is tinted by the Eclectic hand-color process and is as nearly perfect in its light effects, shading and detailed coloring as one could wish. An illustration of the latter is seen in the designs in the rugs. Each figure is perfectly defined, no matter how small or how many colors it contains.

The cast interpreting the roles is more than ordinarily capable. Seldom does one see an entire group of players who are so apparently unconscious of the camera and so natural in their emotions whether they be mirthful or tensely dramatic.

In the opening scene Theodore Reibeth is seen entering a picture theater in which Aut Nissen is being featured in a photo-drama. He becomes greatly impressed by her beauty and charm and arranges with his friend, the director, to meet her at the studio and see her work in a scene. On leaving the studio he finds her handbag lying near the curb, and, with this as an excuse, pays her a visit. After that he becomes a frequent caller.

His serious nature receives a severe shock one night at a party when he discovers the actress practicing her coquetry on some other men. In the heat of anger he denounces her, telling her that their friendship is at an end.

Some time later Aut Nissen reads of Theodore's marriage and plans a fiendish revenge. He calls in answer to her note and is disarmed by her cordial manner. She playfully begs to be allowed to blindfold and lead him to a surprise. He consents and, to his horror on snatching off the handkerchief when the girl leaves him, finds that he is in a lions' den.

A rope hangs from the ceiling and by jumping he manages to grasp it and pull himself up just in time to escape one of the savage beast's attack. By constant swinging he finally reaches the balcony railing, pulls himself over and hurries out of the house, falling in a faint in the street.

Some strangers pick him up and carry him back into the house where, on recovering his senses, Theodore sees Aut Nissen standing beside him. The shock of the past events and the fear that he may again be left to the mercy of the lions, proves too much for him in his weakened condition and he dies. In spite of her vengeful trickery the actress really loves Theodore, and is so despondent at his death that she climbs the balcony railing, jumps down among the lions and they put an end to her grief.

"BUNGLING BUNK'S BUNCO" is all that its name implies and more. Not only does Bunk bungle and bunco, but what is worse, he gets caught at it each time. It is a three-reel farce comedy made by the Pathe Players in the American studio and is being released through the Eclectic Film Company.

It furnishes a happy relaxation from anything, hot weather, conversation, dramas or the usual run of comedies and will provoke laughter from the most pessimistic. The fun follows in the wake of Bunk's efforts to prove his hunting prowess and courage to his sweetheart, and since Bunk does nothing else from the beginning of the first reel to the end of the third the picture is a continuous string of mirth.

The film was made in St. Augustine and abounds in just the right kind of tropical scenery. The interior settings are wonderful. In many of them it is almost impossible to tell exactly where the trees in the foreground end and the painted scenic backgrounds begin.

W. R. Seymour plays the titular role, and plays it well. Lillian Wiggins has a prominent part in Lillian Marston, the object of Bunk's struggles through heroism. The cast, taken altogether, is quite a large one and contains many important but short parts, two of which are those of the Persian princess (Countess de Merstina) and her father (Charles E. Bunnell).

Takes a Big Contract

What is perhaps the largest industrial film undertaking yet assumed by any company is the combination of contracts recently made by the Bon Ray Film Company, of Woodside, Long Island, with practically all of the Southern States. The Bon Ray Film Company has agreed to have something like 250,000 feet of film descriptive of the industries, scenery and advantages of the Southern States, completed by November first. These films will be exhibited in the respective state buildings of the Southern States at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The contracts were negotiated by F. E. Holliday, president of the Bon Ray Film Company, within the past two weeks, while on a trip over the South. The business details of the work are being handled by S. I. Connor, G. W. Brennan and Albert Blum, and the camera work by Otto Gilmore, W. J. Kraft, and William Colfax. These men are now all at work in the South.

House Peters a Benedict

House Peters, the New York motion picture actor who has just concluded his contract with the California Motion Picture Corporation at San Rafael, recently joined the ranks of the benedicts. Mrs. Peters is a New York girl and crossed the continent to join the star in San Rafael. It is understood that the couple will take an extensive honeymoon before the husband returns to his picture work.

Splendid Trio of Edison Comedies

True Love Triumphant

THE theme of "A Summer Resort Idyll" is not entirely a new one, having been used in different ways before in books, plays, and photoplays, but it is one of those subjects that always offer advantages for introducing new views and situations, comic or dramatic, though the general framework might be the same, that of a successful man who changes places and names for a time with a less fortunate friend and enjoys the novelty of standing on the side and seeing whether it is his personality or the combined power of his wealth and name that is most influential.

The Edison version of this complication is a comedy and will be released September 16.

Augustus Phillips takes the part of the young millionaire who tires of being forever patronized and changes places with a poor friend while on a visit to a fashionable summer resort. He sees his impersonator become popular instantly, while he is not only disregarded but snubbed outright whenever he invites himself into any of the conversations—with one exception, a young girl who is attracted to him because he does not seem to be dependent on wealth to make an impression.

William Wadsworth in the role of the young millionaire is besieged by all the marriageable girls at the resort and is nearly overwhelmed by the attentions and photographs showered on him.

Phillips proposes to his one and only admirer and is accepted. He discloses his true identity and the girl, for a moment, seriously considers breaking the engagement but is finally convinced that the recovery of his name will make no difference in the disposition of her lover.

When the rest of the girls learn which is the real millionaire they, of course, greet Wadsworth frigidly, and at the depot give him a rousing farewell in the form of several well-aimed heads of cabbage, and numerous tomatoes, eggs, and cantaloupes.

IN his pursuit of a wife Wood B. Wedd has been jilted many times, but never quite so badly as in "Love by the Pound." It is not that there is any more frigidity in this "turn-down" than in the others that makes it seem so heartless, but rather because the girl he picked out to marry didn't seem to consider him seriously as a suitor and neglected to notify him when she gets married, leaving him still attempting to qualify for her hand.

As usual William Wadsworth is the ambitious Wood B. Wedd, and Arthur Housman, his ever faithful friend Darby Jenks. Jessie Stevens and Frank A. Lyons are the two "heavies" in the picture. Slowly but surely Wadsworth is getting around to all the women in the Edison studio with his plea for a life partner. On or about September 20 is when the picture will be released.

Wood B. Wedd meets a woman who is, in his opinion, as many others have been, just the person to make his wife. When he approaches the subject, however, he is told that he is too thin, but that if he increases his weight to equal his sweetheart's, who weighs over two hundred pounds, there may be some hope for him.

Wood B. again falls in love.

Wood B. buys, eats, and drinks anything recommended to him as a fat producer but without success. In the meantime the object of his affections meets a stout man, falls in love with him, and becomes his wife. Still training for an increase in avoirdupois, Wedd meets his fat friend on the street, is introduced to her husband, and faints from the shock.

SLAPSTICK of the right sort has been injected with good results into "Post No Bills," an Edison comedy to be released on September 23. The action is fast and humorous but never destructive, and the story holds through it all.

Arthur Housman and Gladys Hulette have the leading parts and are supported by William Wadsworth, Harry Gripp and Mrs. C. Jay Williams.

Will Stark and Bill Stivens, billposters, are considerably peeved when they see the rain wash off their freshly posted bills, and mix some paste that will hold in any kind of weather. They are so successful in their attempt to get a good paste that when Stivens shakes hands with Stark, while he has some of the new mixture on his hand, it is almost impossible for them to break the grasp.

Stark is in love with Nellie Prim, but seldom gets a chance to see her because of her Aunt Susan. Knowing that the cranky Susan would never agree to their marriage, the young couple elope and then return for forgiveness.

In the meantime Stark's partner, Stivens, has become antagonized by Aunt Susan's feelings toward his friend. To get even, he puts a big poster of a ballet dancer on the side of her barn, and poses beside it for an acquaintance who wants to take his picture. Aunt Susan is in the barn at the time and, hearing voices outside, opens the window to see who it is, just as the man snaps the picture. The developed negative shows a photograph of Aunt Susan's head on a ballet dancer's figure.

At first, when appealed to, the indignant old maid refuses to forgive her niece's elopement, but when Stivens and his friend show her the picture and threaten to have it printed in the paper if she doesn't forgive the newly-married couple, Aunt Susan gives in and promises to end her hostilities towards Stark.

Part Ten is Exciting

Part ten of "The Million Dollar Mystery" is highly exciting, for in this portion of the Thanhouser serial story Florence is kidnaped by Brane and taken aboard a small launch which Florence sets afire in order to escape. Before the picture ends she is once more rescued by the redoubtable Jim Norton, so we can breathe easy for another week.

As the picture begins we see Jones, the butler, and Norton being shadowed to a railway station by Braine and others of the conspirators. Norton is separated from Jones and ere he can prevent it shanghaied aboard a small fishing schooner. Braine, meanwhile, has learned that Florence is in the care of some humble fishing folk at a nearby village, and he goes there, disguised as her father, in order to kidnap her.

Braine's rough treatment of Florence, who is still dazed and only half conscious, as a result of the terrible experiences through which she has passed, leads the fisherman and his wife to refuse to allow her to depart with Braine. Foiled in this plan, Braine summons others to his assistance and Florence is taken away by main force and loaded aboard a small launch. Realizing that she is again in the clutches of the conspirators, the brave girl sets the boat afire, hoping thereby to be seen and rescued by some passing boat.

When a fishing schooner pulls up alongside and transfers, Braine, Florence and the others to its decks, Forence is delighted to behold Norton among the crew of the schooner. The sight of him restores her mentality and the two at once set about planning a scheme to outwit Braine. Braine has demanded of the captain of the fishing schooner that he be put ashore, and while he is in his cabin changing his clothing, Norton manages to surprise and overpower him.

Dressing in Braine's clothes and false beard, Norton comes on deck, whispers his identity to Florence, and is put ashore as Braine. Once the two are ashore and safe from observation Norton pulls off his disguise and the two enjoy a hearty laugh at Braine's expense, for that gentleman is still a prisoner in the cabin of the fishing schooner, as the film ends.

Pathe Actor Honored

Cabled reports from Paris to the American newspapers on August 14 stated that Commander in Chief Joffre of the French army had conferred the first medal of the war upon corporal of dragoons Escoffier for "conspicuous gallantry in action."

Pathe Freres have just received private advices that the hero thus signally honored is the well known actor Escoffier, a member of their stock company in Vincennes and a man of fine talent.

M. Escoffier has appeared in a number of big Pathe and Eclectric features among them being "Germinal," "Leaves of Memory" and "Rocambole."

No Increase in Carbon Prices

In this season of the general increase in prices of commodities of all kinds, the Kleine Optical Company announces that its stock of carbons will be sold at regular retail prices until exhausted. Unlike a number of supply houses, no advantage will be taken of theater owners to institute a general raise on stocks purchased at the usual figure before the war. Carbons are being sold in limited quantities to single purchasers.

Thoughtlessness Causes Tragedy

Splendid Dramatic Offering

TEEMING with dramatic action that goes straight to the heart and presenting a set of characters that appear to be living, breathing people, the two-reel release of the American Film Manufacturing Company for August 31, entitled "The Aftermath" is one of exceptional merit.

The theme of the story deals with the awful results of thoughtlessness and with the love of a man for his mother who is guilty of murder. The setting is in a home where nothing exceptional has ever happened and the sudden intrusion of the dramatic into this peaceful atmosphere serves to focus the interest strongly.

The real appeal of the production, however, lies in the acting. William Garwood, Vivian Rich, Louise Lester and Harry Von Meter form the quartette upon whose shoulders falls the burden of realistically portraying the emotions of their characters in situations which are so delicate that the slightest confusion of motive would spoil the effect. This splendid group of "Flying A" stars, however, have a perfect understanding of the roles they interpret and this, coupled with their splendid histronic powers, results in the development of life-like characters. Jack Richardson also does fine work in a limited role.

Tom sacrifices himself.

The settings are very well arranged and the photography is of the best. The supernumeraries used in several scenes in the first reel show a great deal of life and appear to sense the fact that they are portraying a certain type of people.

The picture is one which is certain to hold the interest of the varied classes of motion picture patrons throughout the two reels and is one which no exhibitor will make a mistake in booking.

The story opens with a strike scene at the shops of Harrison Gage, a wealthy manufacturer. Tom Morrison, whom the strikers look up to as the man who will lead them through their trouble, talks with the men and asks them to be patient for a while, telling them that eventually they will triumph. The strikers, however, have families to support and when they are forced to go without their salary for a few weeks they are in need. Some of them become desperate and break into several houses, some of which are in the neighborhood of the Morrison home.

Tom's mother is nervous and, despite her son's reassurance that nothing will happen, she asks him to purchase a pistol for her protection as she fears their home will also be entered. Tom's father has just been appointed detective but says nothing to the family that day as he wishes to keep it a secret until he has made his first arrest and then surprise them. The daughter, Ann, is a great favorite of her father's and the two are inseparable pals.

Harrison Gage sends his son, Frank, to see Tom and endeavor to settle the strike by means of arbitration. The two men meet on the street, just as Tom is going to buy the pistol for his mother and decide to talk the matter over that night at the Morrison home. Tom returns at supper time and gives the pistol to his mother and she places it under her pillow. After a short time Mr. and Mrs. Harrison and Ann retire and it is not long before young Gage arrives.

Tom and Gage sit down and discuss the strike pro and con but neither will give ground to the other and as the minutes grow into hours the argument becomes warm. A policeman passes the house and hears the dispute but feels that it is not his place to interfere and so the men continue the discussion.

Mrs. Morrison awakes suddenly and hears the voices in the room below. She believes that the prowlers she feared have broken into the house and at once takes the pistol and starts down the stairs. Gage sees that he cannot convince Tom that the strike is wrong and starts to leave. He is just at the door when Mrs. Morrison reaches the staircase. Through carelessness she pulls the trigger of the pistol and the bullet strikes Gage.

Tom, who did not accompany Gage to the door, hears the shot and when he reaches the fallen man his mother is standing over the body with the revolver in her hand. She collapses a moment later.

The policeman hears the shot, as does Mr. Morrison and Ann. All rush at once to the spot. Tom knows they are coming and in an instant decides the course he will take. He places the pistol in his pocket and flees from his home. The policeman sees, and believing him to be the murderer, follows. Morrison also believes that his son is guilty of the crime and is heartbroken when he is assigned to the case. Ann pleads with him not to follow Tom but it is no use. His newly acquired position as an officer of the law forces him to pursue his own son.

The night slowly passes into morning and Ann watches at the side of her mother's bed while Morrison, with other detectives, searches for Tom. The man who has shielded his mother flees before them and succeeds in covering his trail in such a manner that they cannot locate him.

He is about to catch a freight train to another city when a vision of his mother appears to him and he knows that he cannot leave her. He retraces his steps, again dodging his pursuers, and returns to his home. Mrs. Morrison is still unconscious and her condition is now serious. Tom kneels at her bedside while Ann, feeling it her duty to call her father, struggles between emotions.

Morrison, failing to locate Tom, returns home for dinner and the boy starts to escape but as his mother recovers consciousness he stops to tell her he is safe. Then he sees he is trapped and surrenders to his father, but the detective cannot arrest him and tells him to go. The police come to the house and Morrison, believing his son has gone, tells them they may look upstairs.

The officers of the law go to the door of Mrs. Morrison's room and see Tom and Ann kneeling at the bedside of the mother, who is now dying. Just before she passes away she confesses the fact that it was she that fired the fatal shot and the police know that there is no further need for them and leave. With the death of Mrs. Morrison the penalty of her thoughtlessness has been paid and at her bedside three silent figures, the broken hearted husband, and devoted son and the loving daughter, mourn.

The cast is as follows:

Tom Morrison .....William Garwood
Ann Morrison, his sister.....Vivian Rich
Mrs. Morrison, their mother.....Louise Lester
Richard Morrison, their father.....Harry Von Meter
Harrison Gage, a wealthy manufacturer.....Tom Gulliver
Frank Gage, his son.....Jack Richardson

Noblewoman Acts for Keanograph

Baroness von Saxe, a member of one of Germany's oldest and most distinguished families, whose castle at Dresden is one of the show places of that city, recently qualified as an impromptu screen actress, when with her daughter Leonora, she appeared in a scene in "Money," the seven part production of the United Keanograph Film Company of Fairfax, California.

The two ladies were induced by James Keane to face the camera in a scene taken in the Union Iron Works in San Francisco. Incidentally, the baroness's sumptuous limousine, her footman and chauffeur were pressed into service, livery and all.

The interest in motion pictures which led the baroness to take a trip to Fairfax to see a motion picture studio and the work of producing "Money" was actuated by the fact that her father, a general in the German army now facing the Russian legions on the frontier, was the first nobleman in Germany to install a projection machine in his castle. The baroness says that some of her happiest home moments were those spent in the miniature theater in which she saw screen presentations of our American subjects.

Reel Fellows Hold Rousing Meeting

One of the most successful meetings held by the Reel Fellows Club of Chicago, was enjoyed on Wednesday evening at the Advertising Club headquarters, where the members banqueted and enjoyed a well selected program furnished by the entertainment committee. Beside vocalists, singers and monologists, the club was entertained with a variety of the latest dances as interpreted by French and Jasper. Regardless of the warm weather the attendance was the largest enjoyed since the inception of the club. Also many new members were admitted bringing the club membership far above the hundred mark.

of the screen gives a realistic imitation of all theatrical sounds. The fine interpretations given the film is fully appreciated by the Parisian audience, which frequently show its approval by loud applause.

About a month ago when the Lord Mayor of London was the guest of the Paris municipality M. Poincare, President of the French Republic, presided at the official consecration of the cinematograph at the Gaumont Palace. The building was decked in gala attire for the occasion, the sides of the entrance flanked by the Republican Guard while the guests of the municipality and prominent citizens of Paris were entertained in a royal style by the house of Gaumont. The French press in its observations said:—"It was the greatest cinema in Paris, to which was accorded the signal honor of entertaining the delegates of the foreign municipalities, the guests of the town of Paris."

Baumann Organizes Popular Program

Quality Films Assured

SOME day, no doubt, a history of the motion picture industry will be written which will tell the story of this wonderful business, step by step, from its insignificant beginnings down (or shall we say up) to the marvelous accomplishments of latter days.

Across the stretch of years from the time when 50-foot films were eagerly welcomed by public and exhibitors alike, to the motion picture of today—in its thousands of feet of story—there has been building an achievement unrivaled in the world's history of business development.

The needs of the film world in the early days called for men of brains, of ingenuity, of physical strength—men unfaltering in the courage of their convictions—men of ideas.

One who answered the call many years ago, or rather who came forward without call, in realization of the opportunities the field offered, was Charles O. Baumann, president of the recently formed Popular Photo Plays Corporation and his coming added to the galaxy a star of first magnitude.

The President of The Popular Photo Plays Corporation.

The march of progress in the motion picture industry has been laid along the path of new ideas—of this necessary qualification Mr. Baumann seems to have an apparently inexhaustible fund. In 1908 he entered the field and met the business as it existed then. His first venture was in the purchasing of films from manufacturers and renting them to exhibitors, for that's how the business was done in those days. In this way he acquired a thorough knowledge of the tastes of the motion picture public and the needs of the exhibitors.

As in other industries, the blight of monopoly began to fasten itself upon the motion picture business and Mr. Baumann soon saw that he was having difficulty in obtaining pictures of the proper quality and attractiveness to suit the requirements of his customers' needs.

Being a man who decides quickly, he lost no time in meeting his first crisis. With characteristic decision he made the bold stroke of entering the manufacturing business and formed in 1909 the New York Motion Picture Company. Along about this time other men, emboldened by the success which had met Mr. Baumann's efforts, entered the field of independent manufacturing and as he realized that "in union there is strength," he formed the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company to handle the product of the manufacturers who had followed his lead. Mr. Baumann accepted the office of treasurer of the sales company and became its guiding spirit. His progressive ideas were put in force and from a rather humble start an organization was built which was soon transacting a business of upwards of $8,000,000 a year, throughout the United States and Canada.

In 1912 Mr. Baumann took another step forward. Several of the plants and brands of the Sales Company were combined with others of equally high standard and the Universal Film Manufacturing Company was organized.

Always a personality with high ideals and a craving for quality throughout, from the conception of a film to its method of distribution, Mr. Baumann realized while filling the duties of president of the Universal corporaton, that his best work and work most pleasurable to his tastes might be fruitful in concentrating on two or three brands and making them regardless of expense or investment absolutely the best to be had.

He therefore resigned from the Universal corporation and with Keystone, Kay Bee and Broncho brands entered the manufacturing field again. Within a very short time these brands were in popular favor due in part to his untiring efforts and his ever insistent demand for pictures of quality. All this is history, and a splendid commentary on the character and mental equipment of one of the big dominating men of the industry.

There may be some who attribute much of the success of Charles O. Baumann to luck, but they will not be those who count it an honor and pleasure to know him. He has matched steps with progress in his chosen field of endeavor and perhaps kept a foot or so in advance, for in his most recent project he has startled the motion picture industry with an idea, radical in its newness, yet entirely logical.

The basic plan of the new Popular Program, which will be released by the Popular Photo Plays Corporation, is quality—quality in scenario—quality in direction—quality in cast—quality in photography—and quality in distribution. In the last mentioned phase is to be found the new big idea. Each exchange-booking office that will handle Popular Program releases will be under the control and ownership of men who will have full power to arrange with exhibitors for service direct in their respective territory. The old plan of exchanges managed by "lieutenants" of ex-exchange combinations has been abandoned.

In the flesh Charles O. Baumann is a genial faced, good natured man of middle age, with a compelling personality that fairly radiates good cheer, enthusiasm and love of living. In his eyes, those unfailing guides to character and ability, and in the brisk, snappy enunciation, are to be found the keys to the reason for his success. A true friend, as scores of his less fortunate brethren are quick to testify, a clean living, clean-minded man, whose greatest pleasure in life is his work, yet who finds time for playing of the right kind —and there you have Charles O. Baumann.

Hammerstein Opens Theatre

On Friday evening, August 21, Oscar Hammerstein formally opened his new Lexington Opera House, one of the largest and most beautiful motion picture theaters in the country. The story is now universally known of how Mr. Hammerstein erected the theater with the intention of making it a home for grand opera, but was prevented from carrying out his original purpose by an injunction obtained by the Metropolitan Opera Company restraining him from presenting grand opera in New York City until the year 1920. He then decided to combine the best in motion pictures with opera as the program for his new theater, and the result is an entertainment which appeals to the better class of people by its truly artistic character and "Hammerstein" presentation.

The house itself embodies all the latest improvements in theater construction and is a model of comfort and safety. It has a spacious foyer, wide aisles, roomy, soft-cushioned seats and thirty-one exits which lead to Fifty-first street, Lexington avenue and the court.

The feature of the evening was the five-part Eclectic war drama, "The Last Volunteer," made by an all-star cast of Pathe players in the Pathe American studio. Other pictures shown were a Keystone comedy with Mabel Normand and Roscoe Arbuckle; an Eclair Scientia film, and the filmed version of the Vitagraph silent comedy, "The Honeymooners," in which John Bunny, James Morrison and Mary Charleson appeared for a long run at the Vitagraph theater.

Aside from the screen attractions there was an admission's value alone in the organ recital and the excerpts from two famous operas. A scene of Act IV fram Aida was rendered by Madame C. Sirish, G. Tricario, D. Solomon and S. P. Vernon, and a scene of Act III from Faust by Madame C. Sirish, D. Solomon, G. Simondet and S. P. Vernon.

The audience showed their appreciation of this, "The Highest in Art," by applauding until, after the seventh or eighth curtain call Oscar Hammerstein responded in person and made a short speech. It was brief and to the point. He thanked the people for their appreciative spirit, referred back, in a few words to the trials and hardships through which he has passed and said that, though it were impossible for him to present opera in the theater as he had intended the public would always find it a place where they would receive courteous treatment and be entertained by the highest and best in the operatic and picture art.

The theater is under the general management of the treasurer, Lyle D. Andrews, and Fred L. Bennage is pictorial manager. Max Hirschfeld has the important duty of conductor of the orchestra, and A. Bomboni will give recitals on a $50,000 organ constructed especially for the theater. Good projection is assured by a Gold Fibre screen and two 6A Power's machines.

Film Abounds in Action

"The War of Wars," a photoplay expressly written for Ramo Films, Inc., by Paul M. Potter, the dramatist of "Trilby," was filmed at the outbreak of the present war by Jacquest Crosier, a staff correspondent of that company residing at Nancy, the last French town on the road from Paris to Strasburg. The scene of the play is the village of Grandpre, one of the small communities now devastated on the Franco-Belgian frontier, and the events which it relates in dramatic form are those which have actually happened since the beginning of hostilities.

Job Seeker Steals Films

A motion picture company at room 1012 Candler building, New York, advertised in the newspapers last week for a "hustler" to do exchange work.

Beginning at 6:30 o'clock on Tuesday morning the self-confessed "hustlers" began to gather. They overflowed the hallways on the tenth floor and formed in battle array on the sidewalk in front of the building.

Police answered to hurry calls from the overworked elevator boys and began to chase the youths.

One lad looked around for something to occupy his time—and his hands. The door opposite to room 1012 was partly open. Conveniently, temptingly near was a small pile of tin boxes, containing prints of "Master of the World," the three-reel feature subject of the Film Releases of America. A girl in this office was at the far corner of the room. Hearing a slight noise, she turned to see an arm disappear through the door, a can of film going with it.

Running to an outer office she told a man employe, who rushed out. The corridor was empty. Both elevators were guarded but the film was not recovered. Detectives are working on the case.

Sans Grease Paint and Wig

By Mabel Condon

Marguerite Snow.

WHEN the patrons of Fifth avenue and Broadway shops have donned their fall hats, and when the gold has begun to show in the falling leaves in Central Park. that is the time of times to talk about Marguerite Snow. For the autumn, early autumn or late autumn, is her particular season of the year. It is nature-decreed. And "Peggy" is the beneficiary. She loves the colorful browns, gold-tinted, and the soft reds, tone-mellowed, and they, in turn, show their fondness for Peggy by becoming her well.

"Besides, September 9 is my birthday, so I love the fall of the year," rejoiced Peggy, with a satisfied expression in her brown eyes as she reached a brown leather cushion and dropped it over the slipperless foot which protruded from her curled-up corner of the brown divan. For officially it was a not-at-home hour for Peggy, but unofficially she was home and privileged to rest in a negligee, and a corner of the divan, if she wished. And because one of her slippers of dull blue, a match to her negligee of the same shade, had lost itself under the divan, she expressly wished.

"Because," she referred to her liking for autumn time, "the tones and the tints of this season of the year are the ones I like best. So, naturally, I like the season too." Naturally. "Besides," she went on, "the fall has always meant the beginning of new activities to me; the opening in a new part, a new city, maybe, a new show—and always the getting of new gowns and styles, that have ever been such a change from summer ones. The fall—well, it means new life to everything, except to the things that it puts to sleep for the winter. And they're all the better for the auumn and the sleep," she philosophised, thereby holding out a promise of all things well for the fall and its adoptions.

"In pictures, of course," she went on, caressing the pillow that covered the foot, "the fall doesn't typify all these things. For one season of the year is as busy as another on the picture stage. That's what makes my work so different. When I came into pictures it was just as though I hadn't worked on the stage at all, for I had to learn everything from the start. And so many people think that going into pictures from the stage is—well, is like going on a vacation.

"I felt that way myself once; but that was before I had started to work out my contract. It was only then I began to see that working before a camera was a serious occupation, and before long I realized is demanded the same amount of earnest preparation that a stage appearance does. Not in the memorizing of lines, of course, but in an instant and thorough grasp of what is expected of one.

"And the demand it makes upon one for clothes!" The eyes and hands of Peggy lifted themselves toward the buff ceiling and the sleeves of the dull blue negligee took the opportunity to slip back from the white, slender wrists of the Thanhouser days. "It's not that the wear on them amounts to anything, but, my dear, it's the variety."

"Yes, but look at the result," I murmured in defense of the public that rises up, men and women, and blesses the screen artist who does not wear the same suit, even the same two suits, throughout a picture.

"Exactly" returned she who is "Marguerite" Snow when her stateliness of manner asserts itself, as it does when she is on a favorite topic. "I prefer to see people dress the part, whatever that may be, and I know that appearance means a very great deal on the screen. Appearance is a study, and clothes are as much a part of this study as grease-paint and—"

"Wig?" I ventured, and Miss Snow returned the laugh that best suits her frolicsome name "Peggy."

"Yes,—wig! Seriously, though, I believe in the doctrine of clothes."

"Nobody could doubt it," I answered, thinking of the films in which Miss Snow has proved the worth of this doctrine. And then, too, there was the night of the Thanhouser dance, on the coldest night of last winter, when Peggy Snow appeared in a stunningly severe gown of trailing black which set off, beautifully, her richness of hair and skin and eyes. And there was unmistakeable pride in the way which James Cruze introduced her as "my wife," that night.

As the Countess Olga in "The Million Dollar Mystery"series, Marguerite Snow has all the scope in the world for her clothes creed. That though, is secondary, in consideration to what the Snow role really calls for; that is dramatic ability. And Miss Snow has it.

"It was my ambition for years before I started," she said from out of her corner of the divan, on that day that the elusive slipper supplied a lone qualification for Miss Snow's right to the title Cinderella.

"My father was a theatrical man and I began work with him when I was a little girl. We played a reportoire of all the plays a person thinks of, now, as having been the foundation of things theatrical. We traveled and worked together for years. When he died, I worked on by myself and made the coast-to-coast trip many times. Then I took a fancy to Washington, D. C. and played stock there at the Belasco theater for a time. After that I went under Henry W. Savage's management and made a brunette 'College Widow.'

"It was at the close of a season in this role, that I was one of a visiting party to the Thanhouser studio. It was my first intimate knowledge of the world of pictures and I was overwhelmed with the wonder of it. The whole party was invited into a scene and to my amazement, I was asked to work permanently in the company, after that little trial.

"And I've never lost my interest in the work for each new role brings with it a new problem of part and—yes, clothes," she laughed at the recurrence of her favorite doctrine and then added seriously, "When you figure that the clothes I got for the 'Million Dollar Mystery' series alone, cost me thousands of dollars, can't you see how big a doctrine it is?"

There was no disbelief offered as a counter and Miss Snow returned to a further mention of those early days at the Thanhouser studio.

"The first pictures I worked in were 'A Marble Heart,' 'A Woman's Loyalty' 'She'—that's the one that introduced Jimmie"—(meaning "Jimmie" Cruze) —"into the company. Then there was 'East Lynne,' and 'Undine,' and 'The Woman in White,' and 'Carmen,' and 'Dora Thorne.' These are some of the early ones. It's been three years since I came here and adopted the 'Forty-five' minute town for my own.

"We worked down in Florida one year; that was the time Jimmie and I got married. And since then we've played here in the east and have lots of joy which our friends share with us, here in this little apartment. Being right next to the studio, we're always ready—sometimes," she added with a laugh, thinking, I guessed, of the times she hasn't been ready at the director's call.

"But one can't always be ready," she apologized. I agreed and glanced in the general direction of the run-away slipper.

And standing one one foot, Peggy Snow-Cruze smiled a good-bye at the company whom she made at home during her official not-at-home hour.

Press "Finds" Child Actress

"Finds" in theatricals are numerous. Especially this is so when the press agent's brain becomes weary and lax. Many a press man has "found" someone. Many of the "finds" have made good, and a great majority of them have fallen by the wayside. The proof of the celluloid, however, is in the selling, this is the reason this "find" has not been discovered until this late date. "The Littlest Rebel" was produced three months ago. Mimi Yvonne, the child actress, played the role of Captain Carey's seven year old daughter. That she was a child actress was not discovered until the unreeling of the six part Civil War drama a few days ago. The story of her discovery is interesting. She and her mother were crossing the Atlantic on their way from Liverpool, their home, to New York. Frank A. Tichenor, general manager of the Photo Play Productions Company became acquainted with little Mimi, and for five days watched her closely. On his arrival in New York he called on her mother at the Hotel Belmont, and there pleaded with her to let him use Mimi in the production of "The Littlest Rebel." Mimi's mother emphatically refused. Several visits followed, with the result that Mimi was finally permitted to "try out." The opening of "The Littlest Rebel" in Chicago at the Studebaker theater, has opened the eyes of Mr. Tichenor, for he had "discovered" that the press comments on little Mimi are indeed flattering, that the press and public have taken it upon themselves to star her in this dramatic attraction. Mimi will be seen shortly in another production the title of which will be announced later.

Blackwell Working on First Subject

Carlyle Blackwell, late of the Famous Players and formerly leading man and director for Kalem, is now installed in his own studios in Los Angeles at the head of the Favorite Players Film Company. The first subject which will be turned out by this popular star is to be an adaption from Charles Neville Buck's novel, "The Key to Yesterday," and will be four reels in length. Work on the production is now going forward with great rapidity and it will be ready for release within a short time. Mr. Blackwell plans to produce one picture a month at the present time but will shortly add more players and increase the output. He is now negotiating with some of the most popular stars appearing before the camera to take the leading roles in adaptions from plays and novels which have met with unqualified success. He is an actor whose appearance on the screen assures a finished performance and is also a director of exceptional ability.

Carlyle Blackwell.

Owns Rights in Five States

A. M. Gollos, of the Photoplay Production Releasing Company, states that his advertisement in the last issue of Motography should have carried the announcement that he now owns the state rights on "The Littlest Rebel" for the states of Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Minnesota and Michigan.

This film showed to approximately 52,000 people in four weeks at the Studebaker theater. The Vista theater, a new house opening at Forty-seventh and Cottage Grove Avenue, ran "The Littlest Rebel" on the first night to 3,500 people.

Mr. Gollos states that Jones, Linick and Schaefer have booked the film for the Orpheum, Keystone, Century, Plaza, Crystal, Garfield and Lyceum theaters with repeat options.

Actress Awards Contest Prizes

Some time ago Princess Mona Darkfeather conducted a competition for children offering prizes for those who drew the best pictures of an Indian maiden. Over three thousand drawings were received and the prizes have been awarded. There were five classes, arranged according to age. Two of the first prizes went to America, one to Scotland and two to England.

Altogether the English children took far more pains with their drawings and took more prizes than their American cousins. Mona has sent special prizes to forty-six kiddies and has given away over three thousand photographs, for she sent one to each child who contributed to the competition.

Electric Heating of Theaters

Successful English Experiments

THE King's Hall Theater, High street, Lewisham, S. E., London, England, has the distinction, says The Electrical Times, of being at present the largest building in England to be heated exclusively by electricity. It has an area of 160,000 cu. ft., and the theater has a seating capacty for 1,400 persons. Recognizing the hygienic advantages of electric heating and that patrons would appreciate a uniform temperature, with freedom from draughts and the stifling atmosphere so often met with in picture theaters constructed with no regard for scientific heating or ventilation, the promoters of the scheme decided to adopt electricity for all purposes from the start. The building was therefore constructed specially for electric heating, and the experience of over eighteen months, covering two complete winters, has more than justified this enterprising departure.

In all, the connected heating load amounts to 95 kw., a further amount being absorbed by the motor generator for the projector and the lighting supply. Current is taken from the two-phase 200-volt supply of the South Metropolitan Electric Light and Power Company, Ltd., the load being balanced across the two phases. The accompanying illustration (Fig. 1) shows the switch and fuse chamber outside the building, the arrangement of the fuses being neat and get-at-able. Labels on the fuses show at a glance the heating units they control, the cases being earthed in every instance. The panels shown relate to the heating only, those for the motor generator and lighting being on the right-hand wall beyond the reach of the camera. Fig. 2 shows one of the heating units complete. It comprises three "Hestia" convectors rated at 3 kw. apiece, placed in a recess in the wall; a fan for circulating the heated air which passes up a duct above the heaters, and a recessed box containing the automatic switch and "Diamond H" heat-regulating switches for local control. The automatic switch is operated by a Grundy thermostat placed on the farther side of the building diagonally to the heater, so that it is not influenced by the local heat from the convectors. There are eight such units in the building—two in the vestibule and three either side in the theater. A 3 kw., heater with thermostatic control is fitted in the manager's room, two similar units in the staff room, and two portable 3 kw. heaters, one at either end of the orchestra.

The heaters are cylindrical in form, with nechrome spirals wound spirally over asbestos-covered tubes. Cold air can be drawn either from outside the building, from inside, or partly from both, the source being controlled by an adjustable damper.

Above the convectors is a duct terminating in an outlet in the wall about 8 ft. from the ground, in which is housed a 15-in. exhaust fan. This draws up the cold air from below through and around the heating elements, the hot air being discharged into the hall at a temperature regulated by the local switches. Thus the center heater has three-heat regulations, absorbing 1, 2, or 3 kw., while the outer pair are controlled together, the power consumption at the three heats being 2, 4, and 6 kw. Ruby lamps are fitted behind a glass panel in the heater case, and in the case of the two outer convectors can be switched on independently of the heating coils. The lamp in the center heater is shunted permanently across the element terminals, so that an optical indication is given when the thermostat switches the heaters into circuit.

The thermostats are set to maintain an average temperature of 58° F. throughout the building, and so sensitive are they that a variation of half a degree either way is sufficient to close or open the relay circuit. During the winter, when the outside temperature is in the neighborhood of freezing point, the main switches are closed about four o'clock in the afternoon, and immediately every heater comes into operation. By 6.30 p. m., when the entertainment commences, the temperature has reached the required degree, and one by one the heaters are automatically switched off. In the spring the required temperature can be reached in something like half an hour after switching on, while in the summer, when no artificial heat is required, the apparatus is used to cool the atmosphere. For this purpose the fans are operated independently, and draw cool air from outside through the dead convectors, the air passing around broken ice placed in trays.

Two forms of the Grundy thermostat are used, one being that adopted at Lewisham, and having seven compound metal expansion strips, while the other is a modified type with a single such strip. These strips, being composed of brass and a special steel alloy having different coefficients of expansion, and being held rigidly at the top end, with a flexible coupling at the lower extremities, are influenced by changes in temperature, the effect being to bend or flex the strips one way or the other. This movement causes a trigger to engage with a slot formed in a rocking lever which carries contact pieces at either end, arranged to dip into mercury cups. In the second form of thermostat these contacts and mercury cups are replaced by a closed glass tube about 1 in. long containing a globule of mercury, platinum wires being fused into each end. A very slight displacement of the compound strips suffices to throw the rocking lever into its extreme position, the lever tilting this tube and making contact between the wires at one end or the other, thus closing a relay circuit and opening or closing the main switch. The thermostat is operated by a couple of dry or Leclanche cells, the wiring between the thermostat and switch being such as is used for bell work.

The pattern of thermostat used at Lewisham is enclosed in a wire mesh casing so as to protect the moving strips, without shielding them from temperature changes. In the alternative pattern a polished wooden box is employed, with wire mesh panels in front, sides, top and bottom, a thermometer being mounted inside the door.

The distance between the fixed upper pivot of the bi-metal strips and the moving tongue or trigger at their free end varies with changes in temperature, and this might cause the latter to miss, or to engage too deeply in the slot, and prevent further movement. The parts are therefore so designed that allowance is made for this variation in the distance, and this is an important feature of the device. The trigger, after having thrown the rocking lever, is free to continue its movement. This permits the compound metal strips to expand indefinitely in the same direction, without being strained and their adjustment altered, as would otherwise be the case. When the temperature varies so as to cause the strips to flex in the opposite direction, the trigger moves over the rocking lever until it reaches and engages with the slot, thus overbalancing the mercury tube and reversing the electrical connection. The strips are free to continue to expand in this direction also.

With a thermostat, in which a straight-on or rubbing contact is made, the continued expansion of the bi-metal strips would not only strain them, but would affect their adjustment, while when the expanding strips had nearly established contact with the fixed terminal, vibration of the building or other causes might cause intermittent contact and unnecessary movements in the main switch. This is impossible with the Grundy thermostat, which establishes a quick and positive contact as soon as the rocking lever is actuated, no local vibration affecting the movement. If set, say, at 60° F., the thermostat will always maintain the same adjustment without attention. It is set as follows:—If it be desired to maintain the temperature at, say 60° F., an independent thermometer is placed in the neighborhood, and when this registers 60°, the side screws at the upper end of the strips are adjusted so that the tripper is placed directly over the center of the slot in the rocking arm. A variation of as little as ½° either way will then and at all subsequent times cause the tripper to engage with the slot and overbalance the mercury tube, thus closing or opening the main circuit as may be the case.

A thermograph is placed on the wall and records graphically the changes in temperature night and day. It acts as a check upon the attendant whose duty it is to switch on the heaters, for within ten minutes of starting up the temperature curve shows a sharp upward movement, thereby indicating the time at which the heaters were placed in circuit. Recording ammeters are used to check the consumption of the heaters and to give a permanent chart showing the thermostatic action, while they act as a further check upon the attendant.

In the roof of the theater there is a 4-ft. exhaust fan taking current at 400 volts across the outers of the supply. The linked d.p. switches controlling it can be seen at the top of Fig. 1. It will deal with a large volume of air, and clear the theater atmosphere in a few minutes.

The main switch is operated by two solenoids energised with current from the thermostat battery circuit. They are provided with plungers that overbalance a carriage carrying a second sealed glass tube containing mercury. The carriage has prongs at either end dipping into deep mercury cups, the prongs being insulated from the lever. From the surface of the mercury to the tops of the cups a depth of about 3 ins. is allowed, thus obviating all risk of splashing of the mercury when making or breaking the main circuit. The use of an overbalancing contact tube in the relay circuit makes it impossible for the main switch to occupy any intermedaite position between fully on and right off, and it also cut off the current from the first solenoid coil after it has done its work, and makes connection with the second coil so that it may be energised with the next movement of the thermostat. Each main switch controls one heating unit only, and is designed to break a circuit carrying 50 amps. at 200 volts.

The current consumption for a complete year for heating and ventilating at the King's Hall amounted to 31,040 kw. hrs.

This works out on the basis of a cent per kw. hr. —a rate at which energy can be purchased in a number of districts—at $325, a reasonable price for the comfort, cleanliness, simplicity, and saving in labor involved by electric heating and ventilating, while the expense of constructing an underground heating chamber, with a chimney, is avoided, as well as the cost of attendance.

Thermostatic control ensures the minimum of current consumption for the required duty, for, being automatic, there is no risk of the heaters being left in circuit after the required temperature has been reached, while, on the other hand, there is no possibility of the temperature falling below that degree, as might be the case if the human element were introduced.

The building was designed by Percy Leeds, Esq., under whose supervision the work was carried out. That the electric heating appeals to the public is proved by the popularity of the theater, which is said to be the most successful in the district.

Colonial Studio a Very Busy Place

Now Filming First Subjects

CHURCHES have served many and varied purposes after being abandoned as places of worship, but few have housed as bustling and energetic a group of people as Christ Church at 226-30 West Thirty-fifth street, New York City, now being used as a studio by the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation.

This company is a new, and will soon be an important factor in the motion picture business. It is capitalized at $2,500,000. and backed and supported by men who know the business from beginning to end and have not jumped into it haphazardly. James D. Law, the president, is a man thoroughly capable of guiding the enterprise through the maze of competition and difficulties it will encounter. In his eight years in the motion picture industry Mr. Law has acquired a broad and practical knowledge of both the manufacturing and distributing ends of the business, and is known as a man with whom it is a pleasure to deal because of his straightforward, business-like methods.

The reins of vice-president and general manager are in the hands of Frederick S. Dudley, for some time vice-president of a $2,000,000 corporation, and an executive of sound judgment, experienced in handling large affairs. John D. Dunlop is treasurer, and a more capable guardian for the funds would be hard to find. He is also connected as stockholder, officer, and director with several other commercial and financial institutions. Hudson Maxim, the world-famous inventor of "Maximite," "Stabilite," and other explosives adopted by the United States government, has been secured as technical expert. Mr. Maxim is consulting engineer and experimental expert for the E. I. Du Pont De Nemours Powder Company, and acts as advisor to the Colonial experimental department.

The important duty of director-in-chief is performed by T. Hayes Hunter, formerly chief producer of the Biograph Company, and, prior to that, director for a number of famous theatrical firms among whom are David Belasco and Klaw and Erlanger. Roland Phillips, editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine, is a director and through him the motion picture rights on many notable literary works have been secured. Gilbert Parker, the famous author, is chairman of the International Board and will supervise the Colonial's interests abroad.

The educational department has been well taken care of in the appointment of Alfred H. Saunders, well known trade-paper man, as manager, and Rich. G. Hollaman as director. Mr. Hollaman is a pioneer in the motion picture field, and is president of the Eden Musee and the Grand Central Palace. Duff C. Law, the technical director, is the inventor of many processes which have considerably lessened and improved the work connected with the making of motion pictures. The inventions of both Mr. Maxim and Mr. Law are controlled exclusively by the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation.

E. J. Carpenter, the studio manager, has plenty of credentials as a theatrical man, having been in the business for fifteen years. He has successfully presented "The Blue Mouse," "The Wolf," "Forty-five Minutes from Broadway," "Girls," and others, and is also the owner of a franchise on the Progressive Burlesque Circuit. This fall he is putting out "The Shepherd of the Hills." Verily, Mr. Carpenter is a busy man, but he ushers one through the studio with the courtesy of a person who has nothing else to do but point out things and answer questions.

Entering through the arched doors of the church, you pass the time of day with John Alden and Priscilla, whose life-like figures decorate the outer hallway. In the front part of the main floor carpenters are busy making sets for the painters who are as busily engaged painting them. At the rear of the main floor is an extensively equipped property room. A flight of stairs leads up to the studio proper, off of which is Mr. Carpenter's office. Across on the other side of the studio floor are the women's dressing rooms, but en route you have good cause to marvel at the lighting equipment which makes every inch of the eight thousand feet of floor space usable. The lighting plant is acknowledged to be one of the largest in use for a single stage. Two hundred and twenty-four Cooper Hewitts and a number of Kliegle lights furnish day-light illumination. The floor is entirely covered by an overhead lighting arrangement so controlled by a switchboard that a light, or two, or three, can be spotted anywhere in the group. The advantage of this is easily seen in scenes in which only one portion of a room is lighted as by a candle or lamp. The height from floor to roof is about sixty feet and is kept well supplied with fresh air by the co-operation of a big suction fan at one end and the windows at the other, not to mention the vents in the roof.

There are six dressing rooms on this floor, all fitted up with the latest improvements, including full-length mirrors, electric lights, hot and cold water, shower baths, and lavatories. The mezzanine floor has sixteen dressing rooms for the men, all modern, and equipped as the others with hot and cold water, etc. The extras have spacious, comfortable rooms, electric lighted and furnished with large mirrors and enclosed clothes racks.

The picture now in course of production is "The Seats of the Mighty," and if stills, costumes, a capable cast, and able directors can be taken as evidence it is going to be a nine reel feature that is a feature, not merely a multiple reel production. The entire properties used are estimated at a value of $250,000. Of course, these are only rented, but the revenue for that privilege runs into five figures. One of the sets used, a large bedstead inlaid with mother of pearl and copper, a dressing table, and wardrobe carried a duty alone of $12,000 when it was brought into this country. After this mammoth film which they expect to finish in about three weeks a number of popular books will be picturized, "The Gentleman from Indiana" first, and after it all of the Wallingford series, "54-40 or Fight," "The Iron Woman," and a number of others.

Only the two principal leads in "The Seats of the Mighty" are under contract. One is Millicent Evans, formerly leading lady for Biograph and well known on the legitimate stage for her work with Douglas Fairbanks in "The Cub," with William H. Crane in "The Senator Keeps House," and for having played leads in a number of other Broadway successes. The other is Lionel Barrymore, also formerly of Biograph and brother of Ethel, and eldest member of the famous Barrymore family. Among the remainder of the cast are such favorites as Lois Meredith, Glenn White, Thomas Jefferson, and Grace Leigh.

The renting, premium, etc., on the costumes often runs as high as from $317 to $500 per day. In one setting they used tapestries, rugs, and furniture whose total insurance amounted to $150,000. Nothing is spared that can improve on the picture. The gowns are all of the proper color for the occasion at which they are used and are made of the best material.

The Colonial Motion Picture Company has broken into the picture field with but one idea. That is to make good pictures, regardless, and with that as its guiding light it promises big things. Its plan of distribution is through the state-right agencies. The factory for developing is in Philadelphia and the executive offices are located at 18 East Forty-first street, in New York City.

Popular Character Man

William H. Tooker, who plays the leads in the productions of the Life Photo Film Corporation, is an actor of long standing on the legitimate stage, having been under the direction of such celebrated managers as David Belasco and Klaw & Erlanger. Mr. Tooker played the part of "Lawrence Westbrook," banker, in the five part feature release of the Life Photo Film Corporation, "The Banker's Daughter," and the title role in "The Greyhound," by the same company. Mr. Tooker has also played the part of "Dr. Sherwood" in the last release of the Life Photo Film Corporation, the western psychological drama, "Northern Lights." He is a finished artist. His work, in Europe, has been pronounced by the critics the highest form of dramatic acting. Mr. Tooker hails originally from Minneapolis and is a stage as well as a moving picture favorite with the public.

Beauty Products in Demand

The "Beauty" productions being released by the American Film Company, are meeting with general approval among the exhibitors throughout the country. The one and three-sheet lithos issued allow more extensive advertising and insure the exhibitor a full house. Harry Pollard plays the lead with Margarita Fischer playing opposite and the two make an exceptional pair. There are being prepared at the present time a number of subjects on the order of "Whithering Roses," "The Other Train," etc., which have proven such phenominal successes.

The Vitagraph Company's factory at Paris was lately shut down on account of the employes being drafted in the French army, and all business was practically suspended. The work has been resumed this week, however, and the marine service between this country and the Old World has been resumed, so no further inconvenience is expected.

Wallace Beery, the famous "Sweedie" in Essanay comedies, caused "Chick" Evans to sit up and take notice when he drove a golf ball down the fairgreen for 250 yards. "Chick" and "Sweedie" are the principals in a coming Essanay comedy, "Champion Chick Evans Links with Sweedie."

Brevities of the Business

Although Barry O'Neil has been solely directing for the past five years it is quite admissible to classify him under the heading of Lubin Famous Players, as he has been a famous player for over twenty years. Though born in New York, little observation is necessary to tell that he is of Irish parentage and in his stage career he has favored Irish roles especially of the Boucicault type. Since his engagement in the Lubin studio the management has forced upon him such masterpiece productions as Charles Klein's plays, "The Lion and the Mouse" and "The Third Degree," which were five reel features not only directed by O'Neil, but enhanced in spectacular effect by scenes and action which in the Klein manuscripts were only spoken of. One of O'Neil's greatest productions was the famous earthquake photoplay, entitled "When the Earth Trembled," written by Edwin Barbour. The scenes in this picture were most thrilling, houses collapsed and interior scenes showed players of the cast buried in the ruins. In this wonderful picture the interiors of four different houses were constructed for what is called break-aways. O'Neil was the architect.

Realism is O'Neil's great asset; he will take his company a thousand or more miles to get atmosphere. In taking Eugene Walter's drama "The Wolf" some scenes required the settings of Northern Canada—the hunting grounds of the Hudson Bay Company with the trappers, snowshoe men, dog sleds and wolves. The principal players with two cars of equipment were taken north for two weeks and secured the atmosphere which could not possibly have been secured in a more temperate clamate.

Barry O'Neil's method of directing is firm, but tempered with kindness, producing the best results without the friction which so often handicaps the work of more excitable stage managers. The public which enjoys the masterpieces of the animated screen is filled with admiration for the players, but seldom hears of the men behind the guns, who really are responsible for a convincing and brilliant production.

Named after an illustrious predecessor, Elmer Ellsworth Fulton had a hard job cut out for him, but the ownership of the biggest motion picture supply jobbing house in the world would seem to indicate the he has made the best use of his opportunities and upheld the reputation which goes with the name. Born at Canton, Ohio, April 28, 1861, and dependent on his father and mother during his early years he was forced to accompany them on a migration to Cory, afterwards to Titusville, Pennsylvania. In 1871 the family moved to Washington, Indiana, where E. E. finished his schooling by graduating from the local high school. Following his father's demise in 1875 and with the prospects of a position being better in a large city, the family moved to Indianapolis, Indiana, where young Fulton took up the study of telegraphy, working for the Western Union Telegraph Company and later being shifted all around the country for the company. He engaged in the hay and grain business at Dayton, Ohio, in 1882, by his operations gaining the sobriquet of "Corn King of the Miami Valley." At one time he shipped a single consignment of 2,500,000 bushels of corn, this being the largest shipment ever made at Dayton. A disastrous fire cleaned him out and grasping an immediate opportunity he married the girl of his choice and moved to Chicago, where he got a position on the Board of Trade for the Postal Telegraph Company.

Mr. Fulton has been since that time, a commission broker in the hay business, publisher of a hay and grain trade journal, a manufacturer of wire fence material and bale ties, in the hay implement manufacturing business, and in 1906 he went with the Enterprise Optical Company as office manager. Under his supervision this business branched out and became one of the big factors in the projection machine business.

In 1910 Mr. Fulton left the Enterprise Optical Company and started out for himself in a little office in the Railroad building at Chicago as special representative for Lubin films west of Pittsburgh and Buffalo, also jobbing machines and supplies. In 1911 his business had grown so extensively so that he took over a lease of a floor at Lake and LaSalle streets. Since that time more and more space has been added till the company now occupies several floors. A part of one floor is devoted to a model moving picture theater, where the Lubin films are shown to exhibitors.

Mr. Fulton owns the Morse theater in Rogers Park, so he qualifies as a bona fide exhibitor. He has three sons, is a member of the Ohio Association of Commerce and claims to have no fads except work, although he has been arrested for speeding his automobile through Evanston.

Over four hundred Chicago theaters are these days running slides calling attention to the fact that Robert R. Levy is a Republican candidate for clerk of the criminal court at the primaries which will be held on Wednesday, September 9. Mr. Levy as the trade well knows is the president of the Revelry Theater Company, 342 East Forty-seventh street, Chicago, a director of the International Moving Picture Association, and president of the Illinois State branch of the same organization. He was born in New Orleans, La., December 25, 1873, moved to Chicago in 1875, and has been a resident of that city since that time. He was educated in the Chicago public schools, is married, the father of two sons, and resides at 4639 Prairie Avenue. Mr. Levy is also the proprietor of the Forty-seventh Street Drug Company, and for the past twelve years has been engaged in the erection and sale of apartment buildings in the Hyde Park district. He is a member of the Chicago Retail Druggists' Association, the Masonic Fraternities, the Elks, the North American Union, the Independent Order of B'Nai B'rith, the Hamilton Club and the Illinois Athletic Club, and has never before been a candidate for public office. For some time an effort has been made by the exhibitors of Chicago to secure representation in various political lines, but up to the present time very few motion picture men have announced their candidacy for public office. Mr. Levy is popular, energetic and capable and MOTOGRAPHY has no hesitancy in recommending for him the united support of all motion picture men eligible to cast their vote for him. Certainly it will give the exhibitors of Chicago a fine opportunity to demonstrate their power, and the advertising power of their screens, in boosting the cause of any candidate. All of the exchanges have Robert Levy slides which they are prepared to furnish, without cost, to the exhibitor asking for them. Get a slide and boost for "Bob," exhibitors, if you want to place one of your number in office.

Much of the credit for the excellent work being done by the western Kalem Company in Santa Monica, Cal., belongs to Albert W. Hale, the managing-director, who has been with the company only a short time but has made his presence felt in every department.

George Kleine's four-reel war film entitled "European Armies in Action," which deals in an educational manner with the warring armies, received special commission from the Frisco Censorship Board for exhibition in the Golden Gate City last week. San Francisco has determined to vigorously bar out all film calculated to excite racial feeling at this time but this was regarded as an exception to the rule.

The W. H. Bell Feature Film Corporation of Chicago moved their offices from the Monadnock Building to 804 Powers Building last week.

Director Captain Lambart of the Vitagraph Company, who stood next to Chad Fisher, a camera man, when he was killed by lightning in Yonkers, N. Y., recently, is still suffering from the shock.

Fred L. Bennage, formerly advertising and publicity manager for the Progressive Motion Picture Corporation, is now pictorial manager of Hammerstein's Lexington Opera House. Mr. Bennage knows the motion picture and theatrical game from bottom up, and at one time was manager of a concern operating a string of sixty-seven theaters. With this experience behind him the Lexington's standard of entertainment will not suffer under Mr. Bennage's supervision, and a host of friends wish him all possible success in his new undertaking.

C. A. Maddox of Kansas City and William Conn of Minneapolis recently severed all connections with the Ramo Films, Inc.

Grace Cunard and Francis Ford are at present producing "The Mystery of the Roses" which is another of the "Lady Raffles" series. Miss Cunard says that ever since a statement appeared in the papers that she was likely to go into vaudeville that she has received hundreds of letters begging her not to desert the pictures.

William Garwood is giving another of his cameo cut characterizations in "Faith in Humanity" in which Louise Lester has a fine part.

Stella Razeto of the Selig Polyscope Company is a great lover of flowers and she has thoroughly enjoyed playing in "The Reparation" for the reason that many of the scenes have been taken in one of the most beautiful gardens around Los Angeles.

Bess Meredyth is doing some fine work with the Al E. Christie comedy company at the Universal and is equally successful with her efforts in the scenario direction. The versatile actress more than doubles her salary by her ability to think up new plots and to put the stories of well known writers into scenario form. She does not neglect another little item which adds to her bank account either, the breeding of her dogs, but she continues this because she is genuinely fond of the "bow-wows" and not from a money making standpoint.

Carlyle Blackwell is well on the way with his four reeler "The Key to Yesterday" from the well known book of Charles Neville Buck. He made one journey by auto to Pine Crest and took some outdoor wooded scenes and then journeyed to San Diego for his sea and ship matter. Jack Dillon who was with him when he was with the Kalem Company is assisting him generally, and his brother, Max Blackwell, is the general manager of the "Favorite Players" company as the organization is known.

"Casey Jones," the dog mascot of J. P. McGowan's company at the Kalem studios in Glendale, Cal., is familiar to almost every employee on the Salt Lake system and when the company are taking railroad scenes, which is nearly all the time, Casey is apt to jump into a moving train and go for a journey with the baggage man. Miss Helen Holmes, his mistress, recently received a wire from San Diego saying "Casey Jones aboard, will bring back with me." On the following day "Casey" turned up to supper as though nothing had happened.

E. K. Lincoln, leading man of "The Littlest Rebel" and formerly star of the Vitagraph Company, has made arrangements to appear in person at several of the large theaters where this feature is being exhibited.

Donald MacDonald and Bruce Mithgell have organized the "Thistle Photoplays." Three-reel features and one-reel comedies will be put on with Dorothy Davenport, Ed. Alexander and others in the cast. A. W. Coldeway will look after the scenarios and Bert Longnecker is the camera man.

Claire Whitney, has resigned from the Solax-Blache and is at liberty. She has just completed a temporary vaudeville engagement in Edgar Allen Wolff's playlet, "A Little Mother," in which she appeared at the Brighton Beach Music Hall. Miss Whitney was obliged to refuse an offer of the Eclair Company to join their organization at Tucson, Ariona, because of the illness of her mother with whom she lives at No. 209 West 118th street, New York City.

James Lackeye, who has become known as "one of Vitagraph's fat men" has deserted the screen to join Lew Fields company in the legitimate stage production "The High Cost of Living."

All is activity at the Lasky headquarters in Hollywood, Cal. Cecil De Mille is busy working on "The Man From Home," with Charles Richman, Oscar Apfel, is producing "Bobbie Burnit," and Edward Abeles is preparing to appear in "Ready Money," while Bessie Barriscale is on hand for "The Rose of the Rancho."

It is dark at present at the Lubin and Pathe Pacific Coast studios. Wilfred Melville of the former is taking a holiday and Director Hartigan of the latter has departed for the east.

Charles Chaplin, Jess Dandy and Roscoe Arbuckle of Keystone are acting in one comedy together. Can you imagine it?

Frank Montgomery and Mona Darkfeather of the Universal are in New York City at present for an indefinite period.

F. C. McCarrahan took up the position of general manager for the Photoplay Productions Releasing Co. at the Powers building on Wednesday. His many friends join in best wishes.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by maker, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors. Synopses of current films are not printed in MOTOGRAPHY as they may be obtained of the manufacturers.

Baseball Manager Stars in Film

Two Eclectic Features

THE fact alone that John J. McGraw, manager of the New York Giants, plays the leading part in the three-reel Eclectic feature now being released, "Detective Swift," is enough to assure its popularity. Aside from this, however, the picture contains an interesting detective story, good acting, and some of the most wonderful natural scenery that has ever been used as the background for a photodrama.

A great number of the scenes were taken on the Giants-White Sox tour around the world. The action takes one across the great Libyan desert, past many of its points of interest, and through some of the principal cities of Egypt. A few of the places which are included in the picture and which a tourist would travel miles out of his way to visit are Cairo, Heliopolis, the pyramids, the Mosque of Mahomed Ali, and some of the famous Egyptian ruins. At times the natives play quite prominent parts, a number of Arabs mounted on pure bred Arabian horses being used.

As Detective Swift, Mr. McGraw is in the limelight most of the time. He makes an intelligent officer of the law and is perfectly at ease before the camera in all but one or two scenes which, it is safe to say, were the first ones taken. Frank McGlynn directed the picture, both in the Pathe Freres studio and on the world tour, and also plays one of the principal parts, that of Count Otronski, a thief with an international reputation. Mrs. Hans Lobert, Estelle Coffyn, Mae Tunnison, and Lucy Leach all do excellent work in support of this pair.

The detective disturbs Otrouski's confidential chat.

In the first scenes Count Otronski is seen admiring, and finally stealing, a beautiful pearl necklace which has been placed in a drawer of Mrs. Smith's dressing table by her maid, Alice Caldwell. When the burglary is discovered Alice is accused and arrested. Detective Swift is detailed on the case. He hears Alice's story and believes in her innocence but is powerless to effect her release until after the real thief has been apprehended.

Detective Swift searches for a clue.

In searching for clues around the Smith residence he finds a piece of a cuff hanging from one of the porch railings and bearing its owner's laundry mark. He follows the clue and is led to one Count Otronski who is sailing for Europe. Swift books passage on the same boat, and makes the acquaintance of the count, posing as a Chicago business man. The count grows suspicious of his agreeable fellow passenger, and plans to rid himself of him by leaving the boat at Alexandria, crossing Egypt and rejoining the vessel at Port Said.

Swift follows in close pursuit and in a last desperate effort to lose him Otronski bribes a band of Arabs on the Libyan desert to waylay the American following him. When Swift arrives at the Arabian encampment he is seized and about to be bound when one of them notices a ring on the captive's finger which bears the talisman of the tribe, and which Swift received as a present from Sheik Hassan some time before, on one of his visits to America.

With such powerful credentials as these, Swift is released and aided in every possible way to catch the fleeing count. He reaches the steamer just in time and later astonishes the count by confronting him on deck. Baffled in all his schemes, Otronski asks a passenger, Mrs. Gerard, to take care of the jewels for him. Swift sees the transfer and informs the lady of the manner in which the count came into possession of the necklace. Mrs. Gerard at once gives him the jewels and pleads that her name be spared notoriety.

The real object of his trip now being accomplished

Detective Swift is detailed to handle the case.

Swift has the captain place Otronski under arrest and wires New York to release Alice Caldwell as the real thief is in custody. Shortly after his arrival home Swift receives a check for a large sum from Mrs. Gerard with a letter of thanks for keeping her name out of the papers in connection with the arrest of Otronski. Swift's generosity suggests a plan to him which he immediately carries out. Alice Caldwell becomes more deeply indebted than ever to the detective when she receives Mrs. Gerard's check, endorsed over to her, as a compensation for the weeks she spent in jail awaiting the success of Swift's pursuit.

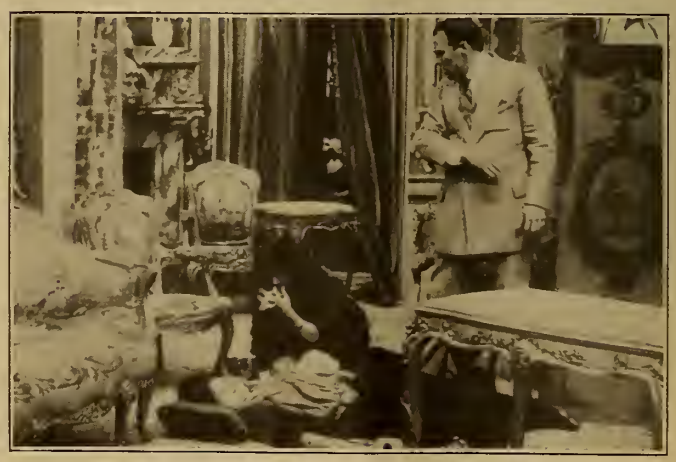
THERE is a gripping story and a strong moral in the three-part Eclectic drama, "The Woman Without a Heart," now being distributed. The climaxes and situations are strongly emphasized and the moral is plain and convincing; all without lowering the film's high standard in any way.

A girl's blind selfishness is the key-note of the story. Her one and only ambition is to live luxuriously and dress well. To realize her vain desires she treads rough shod over the hearts and feelings of those nearest to her, leaving a trail of broken hearts and disrupted homes in her wake. In the end the reaction of her coquetry reduces her to a wandering, homeless exile; a fitting sequel to a life so empty and self-centered.

The picture is well produced, artistic scenes, substantial settings, clear photography, and good acting being apparent at all times. Personality and earnestness are seen in each characterization. The members of the cast seem to be keyed up to the right height of emotion at every situation without bordering on overacting at any time.

Marie Summers lives with her mother in one of the poor tenement districts in London. Hansen, a hard working man of modest means, is in love with Marie and believes his love is returned. She, however, is dissatisfied with her poverty stricken surroundings and longs for finery and gay life. She appeals to Hansen for money and, receiving it, buys herself stylish clothes and leaves home.

A young banker named Warner sees her, is attracted by her beauty, and falls in love with her. He believes her story as to her being an orphan and, after their marriage, gratifies her every whim. At a party one evening Marie arouses her husband's jealousy by her flirtation with one of the other guests. For the first time since their marriage he suspects her of being a coquette.



Hansen learns by accident that Marie is Warner's wife. He attempts to see her and is discovered in her room by Warner. Marie explains his presence by saying he is a thief and begs her husband to let him go free. Hansen returns to Marie's mother, who is quite sick, and informs her of his experience. She determines to visit her daughter in spite of her weakened condition, and, arriving at the house, enters the room while her daughter is telephoning to Warner.

In her surprise Marie lays the receiver on the table, leaving the connection open, and confronts her mother. Mrs. Summers pleads for assistance but receives only a selfish refusal. Finally Marie pushes her mother aside and hurries to the reception to which she has been invited and which Warner has asked her to delay attending until his arrival. Mrs. Summers is seized with a spell of coughing and is barely able to drag herself to the table to call for help into the telephone transmitter.

When Warner arrives she is dead. He is filled with disgust by his wife's brutal selfishness and divorces her. Wandering down one of the streets Marie sees the Baroness Sutton's carriage approaching. She allows the horse to brush her in passing and falls, pretending to be injured. She is taken to the baroness' home and works her way into that lady's favor.

The baroness' son, Herbert, returns home from a trip abroad and at once falls a victim to Marie's coquettish wiles. They become engaged and letters of announcement are sent out. Warner is the recipient of one of them and calls to offer his congratulations. The meeting between him and the bride-to-be is a severe shock. He warns his friend of the true nature of his former wife. Herbert is so depressed by the news that he commits suicide.

Again an outcast, Marie returns to her former home to seek Hansen's forgiveness or rather, protection, but is refused. Shunned as a leper by all, she dies of privation, thus receiving the reward of her selfishness.

Pilgrim Picture Carefully Produced

"Ye Vengeful Vagabonds"

THE two-reel release of the Selig Polyscope Company on September 14 entitled "Ye Vengeful Vagabonds" can best be described as a pageant of pilgrim days, for the number of people employed in the production far exceeds the cast of any other picture by the same company that this reviewer has been privileged to see.

The charm of the play lies in the splendid handling and costuming of the large forces, however, rather than in their number, the two Indian tribes and the group of Pilgrims all showing unmistakable marks of having been watched with utmost care in regard to their every action and minute appearance.

The principals of the cast, Stella Razeto, Guy Oliver, Eugenie Besserer and Fred Huntly, give an excellent portrayal of the ancient type of New England folk, Miss Razeto and Mr. Oliver doing some exceptionally fine dramatic work in several of the scenes in the second reel.

The exterior scenes are beautiful in their arrangement and photography. Two Indian villages are shown which are close to perfection in the atmosphere of realism with which they are surrounded. A Colonial settlement is also shown, several log cabins, a large blockhouse and stockade having been erected for this purpose. Another scene worthy of special mention is the one in which the ducking stool is shown.

The story itself, which was written by James Oliver Curwood, is filled with dramatic action and considerable tension is worked up in the scenes showing the attack of the Indians upon the settlement and the rescue of the Pilgrims by another tribe of savages. The quiet manner in which the film ends is unusual and is certain to be favorably received by the "fans," who are thoroughly tired of the conventional lovers' embrace.

The story is set in a Puritan village near Boston town and at the opening of the first reel we see Heinrich Von Winkle, the vagabond of the settlement, and Betsy Spratt, the gossip spreader, both of whom are very undesirable citizens, receiving their punishment via the ducking stool. Jan, the son of Heinrich, and Peggy, the daughter of Betsy witness the humiliation of their parents and both are filled with anger and shame. They seek to comfort the old folks when they are released but they are in bad temper and refuse to allow the young people near them.

Thus Peggy and Jan are brought together and as both feel sorry for the other a deep love is born between them. The days pass and the old people nurse grouches against those responsible for their ducking and determine to get even, although they can think of no way of evening their score. Jan makes his living by hunting and is about to start into the forest to search for game and goes to say good-bye to Peggy before he leaves.

As he is about to leave they realize their love and embrace tenderly. Jan starts away but in passing through the settlement is stoned by the Puritans who brand him as the son of a vagabond. Peggy returns to the settlement by another route and finds that she is also shunned by the women, who call her the daughter of a witch. The sensitive girl is heartbroken but bears her cross in silence and continues to do good among the weaker Puritans without attracting the notice of her tormentors.

In the forests Jan meets the young chieftain of the Mohawks, an Indian tribe in the neighborhood who have never bothered the settlers but who are continually at war with the Senecas, another tribe whose village is also nearby. The chief and Jan are the staunchest friends and, with several other Mohawks, start on the hunting trip.

In the village Heinrich and Betsy finally think of a plan to avenge themselves upon the people who punished them and decide to lead the Senecas, who hate the settlers, to the village and escape punishment themselves while the others in the settlement will be murdered. Heinrich at once sets out on his mission of treachery and manages to make his way to the chief of the Senecas. The savage leader is delighted with the prospect of the riches to be gained by the slaughter and promises Heinrich that he will not only spare his life and that of Betsy and their children but also give them a share of the spoils they will secure in the raid.

Heinrich returns to the village and steals into the blockhouse, dampening the little supply of powder that is there with water to render it useless. He then tells Betsy of the success of their scheme and together they await the coming of evening to summon the savages from the nearby hills.

Jan and his wife start for Boston town

In the meantime Jan and the Mohawk warriors have completed their hunt and return to the Indian encampment in high spirits over their many trophies. After feasting with the tribe until late in the afternoon Jan starts on his long homeward tramp. The sun sinks in the West and darkness settles down upon the forests. Peggy, all unmindful of the tragedy at hand, goes to bed while Betsy waits eagerly for word from Heinrich.

The vagabond creeps from the settlement and goes to a hill overlooking the little village where he lights a fire. On another hill the Senecas watch for the signal and the moment they see the fire they start toward the little group of cabins. Heinrich rushes to the home of Betsy and tells her that the time to escape has come so Peggy is aroused and the three rush into the woods, according to Heinrich's agreement with the Indians. The girl does not know what the excitement is about and her mother refuses to tell her but forces her to come with them.

Jan hears the war cries of the waring tribe as he nears the settlement and realizes what it means. As he hurries toward the village to warn the people who stoned him only a short time before, he meets his father and the two women. Heinrich orders him to come with them but Jan says his place is with the people of his village and when he refuses to flee Peggy says she will go with him. So while the lovers go to the settlement to spread the alarm the old people flee into the woods.

The Senecas strike and the Pilgrims are hemmed in the blockhouse without powder. There is but one chance of saving the lives of the settlers and that is to secure the aid of the Mohawks. None will risk their life in the attempt, however, until Jan, the vagabond's son, says he will go. He kisses Peggy goodbye and steals through the battle-line of the Senecas to the village of the other tribe.

The Mohawks are only too glad to engage their enemies in battle and within a short time they arrive at the settlement, led by Jan, and put the Senecas to rout. It is then that the village people realize the worth of the vagabond's children, but Jan and Peggy have no desire to remain in the settlement and a few days later they are married and start for Boston town.

And the plot of their parents was never known for the Senecas, when they saw the rival tribe coming, believed they had been trapped by the old people and killed them.

The cast for the production is as follows:

Peggy Spratt.....Stella Razeto
Jan Von Winkle.....Guy Oliver
Betsy Spratt.....Eugenie Besserer
Heinrich Von Winkle.....Fred Huntly

Lubin Actor an Author of Note

Motion pictures have no more interesting or lovable "old man character" than "Uncle Ned" Barbour. His wonderfully human portrayals of the roles assigned to him have won him as high a place in the silent drama as he held for years upon the legitimate stage, where he is well known as a character man. He has collaborated in dramatizing "The White Horse Squadron," and "Northern Lights" as well as being the author of "Antietam" and several of other well known successes. "Uncle Ned" did not come to the pictures because he was "done" as a legitimate actor, but because the same energy that made him leave his home in Kansas at the age of fifteen and join the army to fight Indians in the West, is still with him, and like another "young fellow" he wanted to "get in on" something new and make a "go" of it. Besides his excellent acting he has contributed many valuable scenarios to the Lubin Company. Probably the most successful of his photoplays is the five-reel feature "When the Earth Trembled." He declares he is only getting started.

Sans Grease Paint and Wig

By Mabel Condon

Richard Tucker.

"NOT that I would have objected to becoming president of the bank, some day," said Dick Tucker, as we moved down two places on the long bench in the outer office of the Edison studio, thus making room for the golden-haired child and her mother, "but there were several men ahead of me who would have had to die first. And," he added, yielding another inch in favor of the child, "they were discouragingly healthy."

"Ungrateful," I sympathized and fell in with the suggestion that we remove to the small bench beside the small window.

"I was born in Brooklyn and went to school there," went on the man who is a favorite lead in Edison pictures, his tone intimating that he hadn't at all minded being born in Brooklyn and the result of his schooling speaking for itself in the culture which distinguishes him. Culture, however, is really his birthright, as is also the quiet dignity which by its very nature makes the role of dignified lead his preference. He is often seen in comedy and character parts, however, but to know him well is to know that dignified leads are the beneficiary when played by the calm, cool, gray-eyed Dick Tucker. His is the variety of dignity and calm that causes waiters to give him instant attention, always. That's the type of man Mr. Tucker is.

"But it was in Rochester that I began work as a bank-clerk," he took up his life history. "I was promoted four times; twice because of the men resigned, and then I stayed at one desk because nothing short of resignation or death on the part of the men in advance of me could have put me any higher. And there's nothing easy about working in a bank," he assured me. "The bank-clerk's work begins when the bank closes. And the usual hours in that Rochester bank were from eight-thirty to eight-thirty. There was nothing to look forward to, so I quit. Besides," he added, and it gave promise of being the real reason, "I had been studying plays and hoped I might get a chance to go on the stage. So naturally, I came to New York."

"Naturally" I echoed, and wondered how long the portly gentleman with the out-size handkerchief would tolerate the feet of the golden-haired child in their tattoo against his white trouser-leg.

"And how long before the chance came?" I requested. And the man with the pompadoured brown hair that waves precisely and has the look of never being other than just that way, replied:

"O, some time. There was more studying and there were several positions as bookkeeper in big stores before I got a try-out on the stage, at all. I was living with an uncle," he diverged and smiled a ghost of a pleasant smile at memories that must have been pleasant. "He was an Episcopal minister," he resumed, "and a man of broad ideas. So I went on the stage. Of course, I suped for a time. Then my first triumph came as leading man in stock. Afterward, there were two years with Mrs. Fiske in 'Pillars of Society'; then Hauptmann's 'Hannele' and later the final tour of 'Salvation Nell.' And between times there was stock in the middle West."

"And pictures?" I was about to ask when the inner door of the outer office flew open and through both door and office rushed William Sadler, the fashionably wide skirt of a winter over-coat outspread behind him.

"O-hello!" he greeted us from the outside of the small window. "Just came out for a breath of air," he gasped smilingly from behind the handkerchief that mopped the rotund surface of the Sadler countenance.

The fascinated gaze of the portly gentleman clung to the fur collar which stood up about the Sadler ears; and the portly one's out-size handkerchief began animated service.

"Ready—Sadler!" came somebody's voice and he of the overcoat responded with a "So long!" and a rate of speed equalled only by his coming.

"He's working in the 'My Friend From India' film," explained Mr. Tucker as we brought our heads in out of the window. It was then that we noticed that the portly one had removed the white trouser-leg from the vicinity of the child's active feet and, also, that he had converted Mr. Tucker's magazine into a fan. The result was an expression of almost perfect peace on the portly features, and as Mr. Tucker didn't regret his magazine, peace continued to hover over the outer office.

"And pictures?" I was again inspired to remind Mr. Tucker, but this time it was Andy Clark who hove into view and the outer office. He wore the suit that is most typical of Andy, a messenger-boy's uniform, and it did not require the damp bundle under Andy's arm to let one know that he had been swimming. For his hair was damply sleeked down over his forehead and his face shone with the variety of shine that results only from allowing the sun and air to serve as a towel.

"S' fine!" commented Andy with a nod, as he strode on through the inner door. And from that we judged that the water and sport had met with the approval of the athletic Andy.

"Pictures?" Mr. Tucker answered the question I didn't know he had heard. "I came to the Edison company fifteen months ago, and it's the only studio I've worked in. I've had other offers," he went on. And then said a thing that is characteristic of Dick Tucker. "But, I'd sacrifice much for class; so I've stayed on."

And "class" is the quality that distinguishes whatever part Mr. Tucker plays. "Of course, salary is conceded to be the big consideration, but I think that a name that carries with it prestige, is just as big a consideration."

The film that Mr. Tucker had been awaiting a call for, almost all the afternoon, came just about the time he guessed it wouldn't. And as I departed from the outer office the golden-haired child and the portly gentleman, the latter making violent use of Mr. Tucker's magazine, still remained on the bench and the waiting-list.

To Film Works of Big Authors

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company has secured the film rights to several of the books and short stories by the leading writers of today. Among the authors names appearing on the list of coming productions by this company are Annie Fellows Johnstone, George Gibbs, Eugene Marlowe Rhodes, Campbell MacCollough, Molly Elliott Seawell, George Bronson Howard, Bruno Lessing, Louis Joseph Vance, Clara Louise Burnham, O. Henry, Jacques Futrelle, Arthur Stringer, Eleanor Gates, Booth Tarkington and William MacLeod Raine. The work of other well known writers will be added from time to time.

Herbert Rawlinson and Anna Little in the two-reel Rex drama "A Prince of Bavaria."

All Star Producing "Shore Acres"

For the production in motion pictures of the great drama of plain "down east" folk, "Shore Acres" by the author and eminent character actor James A. Herne, the All Star Feature Corporation which will present this success has engaged a cast which would do justice to any Broadway theatrical offering.

Charles A. Stevenson is cast in the role of Nathaniel Berry; William Riley Hatch who played Capt. Williams in All Star's "Paid In Full" and Peter Galbraith in "Pierre of the Plains" by the same company, will play Martin Berry. Conway Tearle the popular Broadway leading man is cast as Sam, and E. J. Connelley, one of America's leading character actors is cast as "Blake"; Violet Horner, formerly with the Imp, Reliance, Biograph and Vitagraph companies will play "Helen" and little Madge Evans, known throughout the world as an artist's model, will portray the character of "Mildred."

John H. Pratt, under whose personal supervision "Shore Acres" is being made, is now at Block Island with his company where, after arrangements had been made, the entire island was turned over to the All Star company that the production would be accurately pictured.

"Our Mutual Girl" in Kewpie Land

The excitement of her lost cameos at an end Margaret, "Our Mutual Girl," seeks new diversions and a trip to Gloucester to see John Hays Hammond is planned. Miss Jean Parke agrees to accompany Margaret on the trip but before starting they decide to visit Miss Rose O'Neill, the internationally famous writer and artist and creator of the Kewpie dolls, the happiest sprites in all the realms of toyland. Miss O'Neill welcomes them and after a chat gives Margaret one of the larger sizes of the dolls for which she is famous and several smaller ones. In the accompanying illustration "Our Mutual Girl" is seen with an armful of the presents and that she is more than pleased with them is clearly shown by the expression on her face. Miss O'Neill's home is justly called "Kewpie Land" for on all sides of it are found the delightful dolls. Some are large and some small but the ever-cheerful expression on the faces of all is the same.

Balboa Forms New Comedy Company

The well-known vaudeville team of Ben Deely and Marie Wayne, of "The New Bellboy" fame, have joined the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, at its Long Beach, Cal., studios. Mr. Deely has evolved a series of comedy adventures of "Ima Simp, Detective," and has secured the services of William Wolbert, former director of Joker comedies, as director of the new Balboa aggregation. Charles Dudley, who has been a member of the Balboa's organization since it was formed, is one of the funmakers working with Deely & Wayne. Other character and comedy players in the new company are Henry Stanley, a veteran actor, Archie Warren, Brent Carruthers, Suzanne Rogers, Robert Barrow and Alice Brookton.

Pathe's Paris Plant Extensive

By William T. Braun

Mr. Braun, who last week contributed an article on the Gaumont studio, is this week able to get another article across from war-ridden Europe. Mr. Braun will be recalled as the former conductor of Motography's projection department and has a wide knowledge of the motion picture industry in all its branches. He visited Europe this summer to inspect the foreign studios for this publication and to study theater architecture, in which he is deeply interested. Writing from Paris under date of August 15 he says in part: "Things are certainly dead over here. All news is censored before it reaches us and the soldiers are garrisoned outside of Paris at Versailles and Vincennes and strangers are not allowed to leave the gates of Paris if they expect to return. Consequently there is nothing to do but walk the streets, sit around, go up to the American Express office daily for mail, read the old Chicago papers and wait for the transports to come to take us home. At present we have a nice room, three square meals a day and nothing to do but wait. Searchlights play all over the sky every night looking for Zeppelins, but I guess there is little danger of their getting this far."

PATHE FRERES, or Pathe Brothers, have one of the largest industries in Paris. No matter in what quarter of the city you may be, you are sure to find a Pathe Cinema, branch office, or some reminder of this immense establishment.

One naturally, therefore, expects to find the display rooms of a big concern like this housed in elegant quarters. Passing down the Boulevard Italiens, the cafe center and promenade of Parisian business life, we come to a large new stone building, the city home of Pathe. In the corner store we find the display rooms of the famous Pathe "Kok," or home projector, the regular theater projector, the home camera and the large studio camera. Next to this is the display room of the "Pathephone," the "Victrola" of France. You may enter this sumptuous hall at any time during the day and, seating yourself at one of the numerous machines, place the tubes to your ears, and hear a famous operatic selection, ragtime, or anything you desire.

Leaving the Pathephone salon you pass the entrance vestibule of the "Pathe Journal," leading to the offices on the upper floors. Next to this is the elaborately gilded entrance of the Pathe Cinema, one of the few moving picture theaters of Paris where exhibitions are continuous from morning until nearly midnight.

Entering the corner exhibition store we had the good fortune to find one of the salesmen who could speak English. He showed us the various models of theater projectors, both motor and hand driven. The machine bears little resemblance to the Pathe projector which the writer operated several years ago in Chicago. Many fireproof devices have been added; the outside revolving shutter is now made with two discs of three leaves each, the discs revolving in opposite directions. A roomy lamphouse contains the arc lamp, which has adjusting handles facilitating any adjustment desired. The whole is mounted on a fireproof stand absolutely rigid. The prominent machine of the display room, however, is the "Kok" or home projector. Several different models are on exhibition. The machine may be had either motor or hand driven. All of the types are very compact and the machine may be placed upon a table or stand. It is furnished complete with two reels, each holding about 350 feet of film, lenses, motor, transformer, drop cord, and one reel of film ready to be attached to a light socket.

In the rear of the display room is an exhibition room, fitted up in keeping with the rest of the rooms, for the exhibition of the "Kok." A picture about four by five feet is projected with a throw of about 25 feet. Although not quite as bright and steady as the theater picture the results are very satisfactory for home use; and considering the fact that cameras can be had whereby you may take your own pictures, interesting results can be obtained. The size of the picture on the film is about two-thirds the size of the regular film, but has three perforations on one side and only one on the other, thus making it impossible to use any other film on the machine, or the film on other machines.

About a mile southeast of the gates of Paris is the town of Vincennes, the home of Pathe films. The plant is near the famous forest of Vincennes, also the large fort and garrison. Arriving at the plant you enter the large open court, flanked on one side by the new and imposing administration building, on the other side by the film factory, the rear being brought up against the large power plant. All of the buildings are but a few years old and the whole plant is a marvel of cleanliness and order. After a short wait in the large reception hall, we are met by one of the American correspondents who takes us on a tour of the plant.

We first visit the power plant. A large bright room contains two large turbines generating power for the entire plant. The steam is generated in boilers on the floor below. Nearby is another power plant containing three 120-horsepower ice machines, used for cooling the emulsion after applying it to the film. These machines are fed by automatic stoked boilers.

As Pathe makes all its own film and much for private use, a large factory is necessary to supply the demand.

A large five-story building houses this branch of activity and the entire manufacture, including perforation, is carried on within the building. Several smaller shops and buildings complete the plant. About two blocks north is one of the numerous studios of the company. The building is about four stories high, the top being covered by a large glass studio. The lower floors are occupied by scenery and wardrobe storage, dressing rooms, and an interior studio lighted by artificial light. Arriving at the large studio on top, we had the good fortune to see a scene being rehearsed by Pathe's famous actor producer, Max Linder. The scene was the interior of a cafe, set in the familiar French fashion. About a dozen couples were seated at the table when Max, in the role of a bashful son, entered with his father. After they were seated, two cafe queens were invited over to the table by father, greatly to Max's embarrassment. He became highly excited when they attempted to kiss him in the famous French fashion and upset things in general, causing quite a furore among the guests. After drinking a few bottles of wine to quench his excitement, he became quite hilarious, and calling upon the orchestra to render a ragtime, he danced one of the famous French tangoes with one of the queens to the strains of "I Want to Be Way Down in Dixie," at the same time using a plate for a tambourine, until all were very much disheveled.

Mr. Linder has a contract with Pathe to furnish a certain number of photoplays each week, and a poster advertising any of his comedies outside of a theater is sure to draw a crowd. Most of the artists are members of stock companies of famous Parisian theaters and spend their mornings and afternoons at the studios.

Leaving the studio two other outdoor scenes are discovered being taken in the immediate neighborhood. Separate factories for the manufacture of the Pathe projector and camera are situated near Paris, each employing a large number of men. A large establishment is maintained at Nice, where the wonderful atmosphere of the Riviera makes possible the taking of outdoor scenes the year round.

Siegmund Lubin Talks on Pictures

"The eternal question is asked of me every day," said Siegmund Lubin recently, "What will be the future of the moving picture; will it retrograde; 'Peter out;' die of old age; or will it progress? My answer is unhesitatingly that there is no question of its advancement and no limit to its quantity.

"The moving picture was first shown as a wonder of inventive genius and though the subjects were crude and rather uninteresting, it was admitted to be a marvel of photography. From this it has now reached the dignity of literature; it tells stories like plays and books and the greatest writers of the day are contributing their genius to the new art. We are now producing truthful and dignified versions of the best stage literature that is written; works of Charles Klein, J. Hartley Manners, Eugene Walter, Jules Verne and other masters. Yet to come will be the classics of Homer, Shakespeare, Moliere, D'Annunzio, Sheridan,

An exciting moment in Lubin's "Squaring the Triangle," released September 11.

Dumas, Poe, Sir Walter Scott, Bulwer, et al, some of which are now upon the way and the child of the coming generation will, through the moving picture, know the stories of the old masters which now are only given to the college graduate.

"The manufacturers of today are among the richest in the amusement world and spare no expense to perfect the most worthy productions. The old argument about the roller skating and bicycle craze, which only lasted a few years is not in the slightest sense a parallel to this subject. The moving picture is the most enjoyable and restful amusement ever conceived and the cost to the public is an economy.

"It is here to stay and become bigger and bigger every year. It will never kill the legitimate drama, but it will surpass it in patronage. Enormous theaters will be built to hold two to three thousand people, which will be supported by the working classes to whom the moving picture has been the greatest source of pleasure, education and instruction since its conception."

Universal Actress Also a Boxer

Being a picture actress naturally requires a great amount of training but it is seldom an actress dons the boxing gloves to secure it. However, this is the case with Anna Little, the clever leading lady of the Universal Company at their Hollywood, Cal. studios.

Anna Little and Leach Cross enjoying a boxing bout.

In the accompanying picture she is seen in action with Leach Cross, the New York lightweight. It is only one of the many forms of exercise she goes through almost daily to keep herself constantly in trim for whatever athletic "stunt" her director may call on her to perform.

Producing a Series Is Real Work

Cleo Madison, heroine of the "Trey O' Hearts," has been under a terrific strain since the series began and is glad it is half completed. Her director, Wilfred Lucas, is not sorry, either. Doubling in the parts of the twins, Miss Madison has scarcely ever been off the scene, and she has to be constantly changing makeup and clothes, as well as posing for many trying double exposures. She says she gets home in the evening and goes straight to bed. Lucas says he never gets to bed at all.

Margaret Joslin, the "Sophie Clutts" of the Essanay Snakeville comedies, recently returned from a visit with friends in Honolulu. She says the natives of that island are unusually demonstrative at the picture shows, the heroes being cheered whenever they appear while the villains receiving more than their share of hisses.

Wireless Men Rivals for Girl's Hand

"Sparks of Fate"

MELODRAMA of a vigorous kind will be the offering of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company on Friday, September 18, when the two-reel feature, "Sparks of Fate," is scheduled for release.

The story deals with the rivalry of two wireless operators for the hand of a pretty girl, and thrilling scenes in the wireless station and aboard a sinking ship give ample opportunity for some spectacular effects. Director Calvert is to be complimented upon the realism he has put into his picture and the perfect naturalness of the majority of the scenes. To add still further thrills to the feature subject, a mid-lake rescue of the hero by an hydro-aeroplane is introduced and proves a thriller that will "make 'em sit up and take notice."

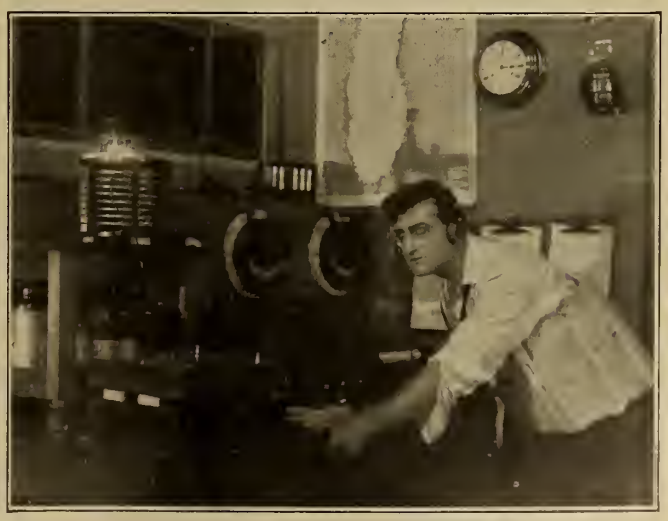
more villainous than in the guise of Wilbur Hayes, the other wireless operator. Ruth Stonehouse is the dainty and charming heroine, for whose love the hero and the heavy struggle desperately throughout two thousand feet of film.



The wireless station on the shores of one of the great lakes, where operator Hayes is on duty at the key, is the opening scene of the picture, and one quickly understands that Hayes is none too friendly with Graham, the wireless man on the other trick. Meanwhile we see Graham, in company with pretty Ruth Donald, approaching the station from the little village below the hill. The two are laughing and chatting together and apparently having the time of their lives, but all is changed when they have stepped within the wireless room, for Ruth's smile vanishes and she appears uneasy and embarrassed while with her both suitors. Graham is not as happy and care-free as he appeared before and Hayes seems gruff and irritable.

Hayes wins the card game and the right to court Ruth.

The tension is only relieved when Graham dons his uniform and takes Hayes' place at the wireless table, thus leaving Hayes free to escort Ruth to her home. Bidding Graham farewell Ruth leaves with Hayes, and the two ramble slowly toward the little cottage where she dwells. Arrived there, Hayes, as he has done many times before, asks Ruth if she cares for him or Graham the more, and when the girl laughs and replies that she loves them both, Hayes angrily twists his cap and leaves her, muttering savagely to himself.

Ruth, meanwhile in her room, compares the photographs of Graham and Hayes and tries in vain to decide which one of the two young men she really does love the best. Hayes ponders and broods over the matter as the days pass, and finally one evening, when Graham is on duty, visits the station and insists upon Graham sends out a frantic call for help.

Graham playing a game of cards with him, the loser to leave town and permit the victor to court Ruth unhampered by the other's presence. Graham, who has been busy in the game of cards with Captain Blank of S. S. Melba, at first treats Hayes' proposition as a joke, but ere long realizes that the other means every word he says. Reluctantly, at last, Graham consents to the game of cards.

The Melba's captain looked curiously on while the odd game begins and, though he says nothing of it at the time, beholds Hayes win the game by cheating, for Graham's rival is unscrupulous enough to hide an ace between the table and, later, to discard another card for the ace and thereby win the contest.

True to the agreement, Graham prepares to immediately leave town, and upon the suggestion of the Melba's captain takes passage aboard that boat. Before he departs, however, Graham mails a note to Ruth in which he tells the girl that he is leaving.

Next day Hayes devotes himself to Ruth and by his attentions seems to advance farther in her affections than he had been able to in the weeks gone by. Much encouraged, Hayes goes on duty that night, his mind already busy with his further plans for winning the girl he loves.

Meanwhile the Melba has encountered misfortune. Fire in the hold causes a panic among the crew and, to add to their troubles, a severe storm comes up. The burning ship pitches and rocks, tumbles and tosses about in the heavy sea, and at the most critical moment the wireless operator of the Melba is injured so badly that he can no longer continue to operate his key in an endeavor to summon aid.

Graham volunteers to assume the injured man's post and his offer is gratefully accepted by the captain. After what seems like hours of effort, Graham gets the wireless apparatus to going properly and again sends out his frantic calls for aid. In the lonely station on the lake shore Hayes receives the call for help. He excitedly takes down the message and is about to give the alarm when he suddenly realizes that his rival, Graham, is aboard the sinking ship. The calls at last cease and Hayes smiles grimly to himself, believing that by then his rival is gone forever.

Meanwhile things aboard the Melba have gone from bad to worse. The captain, learning that Graham's efforts have resulted in no answering call, tells the latter of Hayes' treachery in the card game and confesses that he sat by and permitted the crooked game to end in Graham's defeat. When the boat begins to list and seems all but ready to plunge beneath the weaves, captain and crew take to the lifeboats. Hours afterward, Graham, who has been clinging throughout the night to a tiny life raft, is picked up by a hydroaeroplane and taken ashore at a small fishing village.

Ruth, in the meantime, receiving Graham's note and thinking that, perhaps, after all, he had not cared for her as much as she had believed, decides to accept Hayes, who, since Graham's departure, has been her constant companion. Hayes' happiness is complete when Ruth finally says "Yes," and he insists upon her setting a date but a week or two distant for the wedding. The notice of the wedding, as published in a newspaper, reaches Graham in the little fishing village but the day before the wedding is to take place, and, rising from his bed, he insists upon immediately starting for Ruth's home, to prevent her marrying such a cad as he now knows Hayes to be.

Once more the aviator, who has become one of Graham's best friends, is called upon for assistance and gamely he responds. A full two hours before the time is set for the wedding Graham is set down in the village where Ruth lives. Instead of going straight to her home Graham heads for the wireless station, where he suspects Hayes is still at work. Upon Graham's appearance in the doorway Hayes shrinks away in terror, for he believes it a ghost come to haunt him. So great is his terror that, leaving everything, he flees from the village and never returns.

Ruth, meanwhile, growing nervous over the absence of her bridegroom, and having heard of Graham's miraculous return from the dead, comes to the wireless station to investigate. There she finds Graham. A full explanation, during which Hayes' infamy is exposed, is made and the picture closes with Ruth clasped in the arms of Graham.

Artistic Film by "Flying A" Company

Photographic Effects Charming

A PHOTOPLAY whose entire action hinges on the return of an opera star to the town from which she ran away, and upon the conditions she finds there, is very likely to prove uninteresting and greatly padded unless those engaged in its production are masters of the silent drama.

The theme of "Lola," the two-reel release of the American Film Manufacturing Company for September 7 consists of this single action, but a more artistically handled story has seldom been seen on the screen. It is filled with heart interest that is certain to hold any audience spellbound throughout the full two thousand feet, while one charming bit of camera work after another unfolds the story with graceful deliberation.

Lola's vision appears to Larry.

Starting with an opening scene, which is decidedly novel in its performance of the double duty of introducing Winnifred Greenwood, who takes the title role, and also launching the story, and continuing until the final fade-out, the story is told by scenes which suggest far more than they portray and which entitle the production to the distinction of being "something different."

The acting is very human and its appeal genuine. Miss Greenwood is at home in the role of an opera singer, while Charlotte Burton does some fine emotional acting as her sister. Both transform themselves into lovable village girls in the vision scenes. Edward Coxen and George Fields do very acceptable work in the other important roles, while the support given by the remainder of the cast is very good.

The settings are neatly arranged, and the big one in a cafe is very spacious. The exterior locations are also well chosen and reflect careful advance study.

The opening of the story shows the triumphant return of Lola, a grand opera star, to the town which was formerly her home. During her rise to stardom she has thought but little of her family, but the familiar sights awaken a longing within her breast to again see her father and sister. After her performance she goes to a cafe with her manager and tells him the story of her early life.

Eight years before, she says, she was a village belle and her sister was a plain, home-loving girl. They went for a walk one day and met two young men, one of whom was Larry, a village youth, who was employed in the machine shops. Her sister, May, loved Larry, but the youth turned to Lola. The boys called a short time later and again the growing love of Larry for the pretty sister was shown. May accepted her fate and did nothing to oppose the match. Lola sang for the company and the pastor of the village church heard her and asked her to join the choir. This she did, and the charm of her voice attracted a theatrical agent who happened to attend the church one Sunday. He told her that when an opportunity presented itself he would write her, and she was pleased with the prospect of going on the stage.

Time passed and Larry's attentions continued, but Lola dreamed of her coming career before the footlights. May looked on from afar and longed for the man who loved her sister. Then one day the message from the theatrical manager came and, when her father refused to listen to her going to the city, Lola stole away.

The actress and her manager begin their search.

Lola is asked to sing for the boys.

As she finishes her story the heart of the actress suddenly feels the longing for the love of her family that comes to all people at times, and tells the manager that the next day she will have to look up her sister and father. He agrees to accompany her, and a moment later, amid the pleasure of the life she is used to, she tosses the serious mood into the discard.

The next morning, however, she sets off on her search, accompanied by the manager. She goes to her old home and is told that the family no longer live there, but is given an address where she will find her sister. She follows the directions given her and upon arriving at the house sees May kiss a little girl and send her to join her little playmates. The actress rushes to her sister and, as they are in each other's embrace, the door of the house opens and Larry, his eyes covered by black glasses, comes out. Lola is about to speak to him, but May, terrified, motions her to silence and tells the man that it is merely one of her dressmaking customers. He apologizes for the intrusion and returns to the house.

May then leads Lola to the garden and tells her of the events which have taken place since the day she left home. The morning after Lola's departure her father's rage was so intense that he was taken sick. The same day Larry met with an accident which cost him his sight. He was taken to a hospital and continually called for Lola. The doctor sent for the girl Larry loved, and when it was learned that she had gone away the effect it would have upon the man was feared and May was told to pretend she was her sister. She went to Larry and his fever at once abated.

Daily she visited his bedside and talked to him —and all the time he thought it was Lola. Soon he recovered his strength enough to walk around, but the doctor declared that he would always be blind. He wanted Lola near him all the time, and May was forced to continue her deception. In time they grew to love each other and married. She started to take in sewing and their living was earned that way, as Larry could do no work. Thus they had always lived, Larry still thinking he was married to Lola. May also tells her sister that their father had died from the effects of the illness which had come when she departed.

The actress is overwhelmed by the change and her heart feels heavy. Just then May's little daughter runs up and Lola gathers her into her arms. The tiny hands of the child pat her cheeks and the emotion which arises in the heart of the actress is too much for her to bear. She kisses her sister a loving goodbye and leaves her, never to return.

Lola rejoins her manager and they re-enter their automobile and are driven toward the hotel. And as they pass the throngs who idolize her, the actress realizes that if she had remained at home she would now be the wife of Larry and, while she lives a life of greater comfort than her sister, she knows that of the two she is the unhappy one.

The cast is as follows:

Lola, the prima donna.....Winnifred Greenwood
Larry.....Edward Coxen
May, Lola's Sister.....Charlotte Burton
Lola's Manager.....George Field
Her Father.....John Steppling
Theatrical Agent.....W. J. Tedmarsh
The Pastor.....Perry Banks

Vance Visits the Coast

Joseph Louis Vance, the author of "Trey O' Hearts," recently arrived in California and was feted and welcomed as only professionals can welcome one of their kind. The object of his visit was to consult Bess Meredyth regarding the scenarios she is writing from his serial, and he was extremely complimentary regarding the way in which she has made his stories into photoplay form.

Julius Stern, manager of the Imp studio, was recently appointed supervisor of the production of the Victor staff. At present the following directors are under Mr. Stern's supervision: Herbert Brenon, Frank Crane, George Lessey, George Roubert, Walter Edwin, Ben Wilson and Harry Meyers.

"Captain Swift" adapted from the story by C. Haddon Chambers, is to be the next offering of the Life Photo Film Corporation. It is in five parts and is portrayed by an able cast with the favorites William Tooker, Harry Spingler, David Wall and George De Carlton in leading roles. The story is one of Chambers' best and its film version sustains the interest in as large measure as does the written tale. There are western scenes and those of the East, with their social significance; and there is interesting and continued action. Altogether, "Captain Swift" makes a most acceptable photoplay.

Edison Comedies to Lighten Programs

Three Clever Farces

ON SEPTEMBER 25 the Edison company will release a two-part farce comedy, entitled "Grand Opera in Rubeville." As the name suggests, the plot is laid in a small country town, in which the advent of the opera causes a great deal of ludicrous excitement. A musician visits Rubeville as a means of escaping a board bill in another town, discovers that the people have ambitions, money and horrible singing voices, and works up a large following on the strength of the rivalry for prominence that exists between them.

In one part of the picture several seriously-acted scenes from an opera are introduced, in order that the spectator may appreciate the awkwardly funny reproduction by the amateurs. As Will Green, Herbert Prior injects a tinge of drama into the picture, giving it a serious, rather than a comedy, ending. The principal part is that of the deceitful, emotional Alphonse, in which role Richard Tucker provokes the greater number of laughs. The remainder of the cast is well chosen and their rural characterizations are as comical as their parts allow.

Will Green is organist and director of the choir in the Rubeville church. His appointment of Eldora Perkins as soloist arouses a good deal of jealousy among the other members, they claiming that Green's only reason is that he loves Eldora.

It is into this state of affairs that Alphonse casts his lot when he takes French leave of his boarding house in a nearby town and journeys to Rubeville to earn his living in the easiest way possible. He learns of the choir's trouble and is inspired to teach vocal lessons, his class to be in opposition to Green's. The choir director soons finds his school deserted, all of his pupils, even Eldora, having changed to the class of the more pretentious and up-to-date musician, Alphonse.

Eldora soon becomes the favorite pupil of her new instructor and disregards Green entirely. The class progresses rapidly, in its own estimation, and becomes enthusiastic when Alphonse proposes that they present a famous opera. One of the wealthy residents of the town hears of it and buys his daughter's way into the company. Before the class begins rehearsing, he takes all the pupils and their instructor to one of the theaters in a large city where the opera is being presented, so that they will know better how to take their parts.

The coming of wealth into the class completely changes the past order of things. Instead of Eldora, the rich man's daughter receives Alphonse's special attention. In the meantime Green becomes discouraged at the way things are going and takes a trip out of town. He visits Eldora's aunt and discovers a photograph of Alphonse in the album. He becomes inquisitive and learns that it is only the picture of a man who skipped without paying his board bill. This casually mentioned piece of information is enough to set him afire with eagerness to get back to Rubeville and expose the "professor."

Alphonse's suit with the rich man's daughter has progressed pretty well when the time comes to present the opera. At the end of the performance, the director is surprised by the appearance of his former landlady, who denounces him as a "deadbeat" before the audience. Eldora then begs Green's forgiveness for her treatment of him and is taken back in his affection. The officers seize Alphonse, but at his creditor's request free him. Daybreak the next morning finds a most dejected looking musician walking the railroad track with his back turned on Rubeville.

IN "The Adventure of the Hasty Elopement," Octavius vindicates himself and really captures a pair of automobile thieves. The fact that he spends hours chasing down a foolish clue and comes near being arrested himself does not overshadow his joy in the least when he finally stumbles on the real bandits and captures them with the help of some policemen.

There is much action in the picture which, combined with its humorous situations, will not fail to amuse. September 21 is the day on which it will be released by the Edison Company.

The story follows Detective Octavius' pursuit of thieves. Being a free lance sleuth, any and all thieves come under his jurisdiction. Generally they are not inconvenienced in the least by Octavius' conscientious efforts to trap them, but when the detective reads of the number of automobiles that are being stolen throughout the city, he firmly decides that it shall be stopped.

With this commendable purpose in view he starts out in his auto, but does not go far before he is hailed by a pretty girl, who is in a great hurry to reach Woodmount, and asks him to take her there. Octavius consents and is charmed by his passenger's winning ways. He does not notice that she throws her handkerchief out of the car and so falls into the trap when she asks him to go back and get it. Octavius realizes his mistake when he turns around just in time to see his car disappearing down the road in a cloud of dust.

Positive that this is one of the thieves for whom he is searching, the detective jumps into a car standing in the street and sets out in pursuit. Seeing his machine in front of a house, Octavius rushes in just as the "thief," who really appropriated his car in order to escape her parents, is being married to the young man she was to meet at the parson's house. A moment later a policeman enters and arrests Octavius for exceeding the speed limit. The girl's parents enter while the party stands arguing, and general explanation follows.

Octavius sees his mistake in thinking her a thief, and he and the policeman take the borrowed machine back to the store in front of which it was standing.

Under one of the seat cushions they find a bunch of license plates and suspect that the machine is the property of the men they are hunting. From a hiding place across the street they see two men approach the auto. Calling another policeman, they surprise the fellows, capture them and, as is natural, Octavius takes all the credit to himself and feels like a "sure enough" detective.

THE mother-in-law joke has long ceased to be funny, but in the Edison single-reel comedy drama, "Twins and Trouble," to be released September 26, two pairs of dictatorial "in-law" parents mix up in a way that is seldom used either in stories or plays, and which is amusing in its true-to-life portrayal. When the newlyweds' parents visit them they take possession of the twin babies, father's and mother's wishes regardless. One day both Bob's and Betty's parents visit them and each attempts to exercise the right which, in their opinion, is surely theirs—that of holding one of the grandchildren.

As there are only two children to hold, and four people to hold them, a heated argument takes place. Bob sides with his parents and says that they ought to be allowed both insead of just one child to hold, while Betty takes the stand that her parents should not only have the pleasure of keeping the one child they have, but should also be given the other.

The result is, the young couple break up housekeeping and return home, each having one of the twins. It happens that the maids of both families are being courted by the same man. Bob's parents instruct their maid to take the baby out in the park, and Betty's do the same thing. One of the maids meets her lover and his duplicity is discovered by the other maid, who is passing near the spot. She denounces him for his deceit and he starts hurriedly away. The maids leave the babies on a bench and give chase. While they are gone a washerwoman comes along, places the twins in her big wash-basket and takes them to the nearest police station.

In the meantime, both Bob's and Betty's fathers have decided to go for the other baby and take it by force if necessary. They meet, start to fight and are arrested. While pleading their separate causes before the desk sergeant the station door opens and the washwoman enters with the innocent cause of the dispute. When the wranglers hear her story of finding the twins in the park they are happy to get them back again and agree to bury past quarrels.

When the maids return and fail to find the babies they notify the parents at once. Bob's excitement and worry is doubled when, on calling up Betty to tell her of one of the twins being lost, he learns that the other is lost, also. He and his mother hurry over to Betty's mother's house, and shortly after the two men enter with the twins.

Happiness now restored, the grandparents again want to hold the babies, but Bob and Betty decide "never again" and return home with them.

The Vitagraph director, Theodore Marston, and his company of players including Dorothy Kelly, James Morrison and George Cooper, have returned from a four weeks' stay in the Catskills, where they produced several pictures.

THE USEFUL USES OF PICTURES

WE are all familiar with the practice of the publicity film, and the theory of the school film. We know that their uses are growing constantly more important and more wide-spread. The power to entertain all the people is a wonderful attribute; and while the power also to instruct, to convey information, may be no greater, yet it does just as much to establish the motion picture as an essential part of modern civilization.

Every little while the film finds a new usefulness—not that it gains a new power, but that someone is ingenious enough to dream out a new work for it. So we learn that our government is to use the pictures in demonstrating the results that are being attained by the Forestry Service. Some of the features of national forestry that have been included in the motion pictures are lumbering, the pictures covering everything from the signing of the government contract to the sawing of the boards; planting, grazing and protection. In the Northwest one series of pictures traces the water supply of a great city from protection of the watersheds on a national forest to a point where it flows from a bubbling fountain on a city street.

Seven thousand feet of film will be used in making the pictures, but this will be reduced to 5,000 feet for exhibition purposes. The pictures are being made chifly for the Panama-Pacific exposition, but duplicate films will also be released throughout the country at the same time.

Then again, we hear that the motion picture film is invading the field of the patent specification and drawings. These films have been employed recently for demonstrating the intricate operations of complicated machines before patent courts. The pictures make the details much clearer to the jurors than could be accomplished by drawings and technical explanation. Few of the jurors are men of mechanical training, and the inter-relationship of the various parts of a complicated piece of machinery is often difficult for a layman to grasp.

In the experiments made, it has been found that the motion picture clears up the difficulty of successfully demonstrating inventions. In fact, the pictures have been found to make the workings of the machinery more understandable than the actual observation of the machine. In operation, the machine of involved construction generally goes through its several evolutions much too quickly for the layman to be able to follow them. The picture, however, can be slowed to any desired speed. When the operations are particularly intricate, it can be slowed down and the processes shown can be studied at leisure.

So successful has been the use of motion pictures in the field of patents that suggestions have been made that they would aid much in the class room of mechanics. It is believed that studying the operations of a machine on the film would prove much more fruitful than its study upon the chart alone.

So the uses keep on increasing; and some of them may appear strange and ingenious to the unaccustomed mind, while others are quite self-evident. But all of them, and many more that have never yet been tried, become immediately comprehensible when it is realized that the motion picture is, after all, only a photograph.

It can show many things that the ordinary photograph, the "still" picture, cannot show; but no field into which the regular photographer enters is closed to the motion picture. Too often the layman conceives the peculiar idea that it is an institution, whereas it is but a vehicle for impressions. Those impressions may be anything in the world, according to the dictates of the one who produces them.

THE "CARBON FAMINE."

DISSEMINATORS of news all over the country have suddenly laid hold of the report that there exists a famine in carbons for projection machines. Following their custom of presenting all news in as spectacular a manner as possible, most of them predict that, deprived of their light sources, all the picture theaters will be forced to close in a few weeks. Others, rather more conservative, admit that at least one way out of the difficulty lies in a return to the old calcium light—an illuminant not so satisfactory as imported carbons, but still usable.

It is a fact, of course, that the present supply of imported carbons in this country is extremely low. It is also a fact that American-made carbons at present on the market are not of the right quality for the best projection. So it is quite evident that the trade will have to find some substitute, and that very shortly. But there is no occasion for undue excitement over the circumstance, which finds a present parallel in many other trades.

While American carbons in their present form cannot well be used, at least one carbon manufacturer in this country, with a plant large enough to supply the entire trade, has intimated that its laboratories can produce the proper quality for this specific use if encouraged to do so by the promise of continuous demand. This manufacturer says it was driven off the market by the influx of foreign carbons and has had no temptation to return to it in the face of such competition. Now that the competition is removed it is presumed the company hesitates because, if it should invest in extra plant and stock up several million carbons the war might cease and the old competiton return. But it has announced that it will place on the market very shortly a limited quantity of carbons, to be followed as soon as possible by an adequate supply. And we believe it will succeed in establishing a permanent business.

Even should war end tomorrow it is hardly possible that the foreign manufacturers could instantly resume their former trade relations, and continue their supply as though no interruption had occurred. The American manufacturer who can make carbons as good or nearly as good as those the picture men have been accustomed to using, must be very short-sighted if it does not seize the opportunity. This is only one of many chances that American factories will be given by the big war; but it is one of the earliest to arrive, and it should promise permanence. There is no reason why all the carbons used here should not be made here, if the home manufacturer can deliver the goods.

WARNING TO SOUTHERN EXHIBITORS

A man representing himself as P. Flex of the Coquille Film Company of New Orleans, and who has secured the checks of that company in some manner, is said to be operating in Texas and other southern states. He is passing out checks signed by F. W. Carter, supposedly the president of the firm.

Just A Moment Please

If the various motion picture manufacturers of the country carry out the latest suggestion of the National Board of Censorship, you may expect soon, when you take your seat in your favorite picture theater, to see flashed on the screen a sub-title something like this: "President Wilson has requested Selig to urge you to remain calm during the following battle scene. Be neutral, no matter what your feelings or sympathies in the matter." Or, "By order of President Wilson, expressed through the medium of the National Board of Censorship, Essanay asks you not to cheer while the Germans are being killed in the next scene," or "Hundreds of French soldiers will be shown leaving for the front in our next picture, but President Wilson has asked the National Board of Censorship to ask Pathe to ask you Germans to please refrain from hissing while this picture is on the screen."

We don't know who the feller was, because we weren't in when it happened, but somebody left the following four lines on our desk one day this week and evidently expects us to publish 'em, so here goes:

Motography's Gallery of Picture Players

EDITH (BILLY) STOREY, of the Vitagraph players, was born in New York City, March 18, 1892, which makes the popular leading lady a little over twenty-two years of age. Both of Miss Storey's parents are New Yorkers, and as neither of them ever had any desire to follow the dramatic profession her spark—or rather fire—of genius is attributed to a probable theatrical ancestor generations back. She began her stage career at the age of ten and followed it until some five years ago when she became a member of the Vitagraph stock company. Miss Storey has an exceptionally strong and winning personality and can always be counted on to bring out the best that is in a character. Strong, emotional roles attract her by inclination and temperament, and though often seen in comedy parts they do not appeal to her.

Edith Storey.

JAMES MORRISON'S advent into motion pictures was neither by accident nor for want of something else to do. His career on the legitimate stage was successful but it did not offer him the right opportunity for the work he liked best—pantomime. Mr. Morrison was born and raised in Mattoon, Ill., and attended the public schools of that city. He later entered the University of Chicago, but left prior to receiving a degree. Theatricals then claimed his attention and he studied at the American Academy of Dramtic Arts in New York. After that he became associated with the Alberta Players in a vaudeville pantomimic sketch, and later appeared in "Brown of Harvard" and other road shows, the Marlowe and College Stock companies of Chicago, and different engagements in vaudeville. His success in Vitagraph pictures was instantaneous.

James Morrison.

EARLE WILLIAMS, Vitagraph leading man, is a Californian. His father, Augustus P. Williams, was one of the state's early settlers and emigrated from Booneville, Mo. Earle attended the Oakland grammar and high schools and his first position was as an office boy prior to entering the Polytechnic College of California. Mr. Williams' first theatrical engagement was as utility man in the Baldwin-Melville stock company in New Orleans in 1901. He has appeared in the Frederick Belasco company and the James Neill stock company played with Henry Dixey in "The Man on the Box;" with Helen Ware in "The Third Degree," and has taken prominent parts in many other stage successes. In time the enforced idleness between theatrical seasons proved irksome to Mr. Williams and he applied to the Vitagraph Company for extra parts.

Earle Williams.

NORMA MARIE TALMADGE is one screen star who has never appeared on the legitimate stage and has no aspirations to do so. She was born at Niagara Falls, N. Y., nineteen years ago and raised and educated in Brooklyn. During her summer vacation, shortly after her fifteenth birthday, she played in her first motion picture under Director Charles Kent, and before the high school opening in the fall had attracted so much attention by her remarkable work that she was permanently engaged and has been with the Vita- stock company; ever since. She is exceptionally versatile in her characterizations and has yet to make her first failure. During her few years as a photoplay star Miss Talmadge has appeared in every known variety of parts, and has been featured in one series known as the "Belinda" pictures.

Alco Corporation Important

Still another gigantic combination is added to the roll of feature film distributors with the formation of the Alco Film Corporation. Al Lichtman's Alco Film Company, Incorporated, was the nucleus about which gathered a number of important and well established feature producing companies to join with the Atsco Company, one of the largest picture equipment supply houses in the country, in forming the Alco Film Corporation, whose capitalization is said to be $1,500,000, and whose object will be to not only furnish exhibitors a program of de luxe features, but also to supply everything necessary in the way of mechanical and electrical equipment.

The newcomer in the field expects to be ready for business on October first, though its first release is not scheduled to appear until the fifth of October, when "The Nightingale" with Ethel Barrymore in the featured role will make its appearance. Thereafter one feature will be released each week and the output increased as fast as contracts can be arranged with producing companies capable of producing the superior kind of pictures upon which the Alco Film Corporation will insist.

The producing companies that have already become a part of the new combination are as follows: All Star Feature Corporation, California Motion Picture Corporation, Popular Plays and Players, Inc., Favorite Players' Film Co., and Excelsior Feature Film Co. The combination's initial announcement schedules the following releases: October 5, All Star Feature Corporation, Ethel Barrymore in "The Nightingale," by Augustus Thomas; October 12, California Motion Picture Corporation, Beatriz Michelena and House Peters in "Salomy Jane," by Paul Armstrong; October 19, Popular Plays and Players, Inc., Andrew Mack in "The Ragged Earl"; October 26, Favorite Players' Film Co., Carlyle Blackwell in "The Key to Yesterday," by Charles Neville Buck; November 2, Excelsior Feature Film Co., Octavia Handworth in "Path Forbidden," by John B. Clymer; November 9, All Star Feature Corporation, Digby Bell in "The Education of Mr. Pipp," by Augustus Thomas; November 16, California Motion Picture Corporation, Beatriz Michelena and House Peters in "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," by Alice Hegan Rice and Anne Crawford Flexner; November 23, Popular Plays and Players, Inc., Jacob P. Adler in "Michael Strogoff," by Jules Verne; November 30, Favorite Players' Film Co., Carlyle Blackwell in "The Man Who Could Not Lose."

The problem of effective distribution is always the most important one which presents itself for solution and the Alco plan has been worked out as follows: Distributing centers in twenty ideally located cities in the country have been promoted. In each of these agencies or exchanges there will be interested a number of prominent exhibitors who will use the service provided by the parent company and whose influence in their respective communities is expected to go a great ways in convincing other exhibitors that the Alco service is of superior merit. The feature service will be cleared through these offices and, in addition, each office will be a branch sales room for the distribution of Alco equipment.

In dealing with the various feature producing companies the Alco corporation has contracted to take the entire output of each company for a period of five years. It is said that it has been agreed that none of the companies will make any releases through any other channels and that, as an important provision of the contract, no picture made by any of the companies which fails to come up to the required standard of merit will go any farther than the production stage.

Walter Hoff Seeley, principal owner of the Atsco Company, is president of the new corporation; Al Lichtman, who has most recently been president and general manager of the Alco Film Co., Inc., is vice-president and general manager; William Sievers, secretary and treasurer of the New Grand Central Theater Co. in St. Louis, is treasurer, and William H. Wright, previously known in the amusement world as treasurer of the Excelsior Feature Film Co., is secretary. By virtue of their official connection with the company, the foregoing are also members of the board of directors, in addition to Edmond Koelm, collector of the city of St. Louis, and James J. Reilly, owner of two prosperous theaters in Alton, Illinois; L. Lawrence Weber, the well-known New York theatrical producer; Samuel Newhouse, copper magnate, of Salt Lake City, Utah, and Robert Kane, general manager of the Atsco Company, New York City.

In Behalf of Neutrality

The National Board of Censorship mailed each manufacturer of motion pictures who submits his products to the board the following letter, under date of August 27:

"The preservation of a spirit of absolute neutrality on the part of the American people, as suggested by President Wilson in his recent proclamation, is a matter so vitally important that the National Board of Censorship makes the following suggestion:—

"When you are producing pictures containing war scenes, please precede the actual pictures with about five feet of caption asking the audience kindly to refrain from any expressions of partisanship as the pictures are shown. You will strengthen such an announcement very materially by adding that this request is directly in line with the policy of President Wilson.

"We further suggest that scenes which tend to arouse race hatred because of their realism and horrible detail be treated in a restrained manner.

"Thank you.

"Very truly yours,

"National Board of Censorship of Motion Pictures."

"Flying A" Director Receives Watch

Thomas Ricketts recently received a pleasant surprise when he was handed a wrist watch by the secretary of Richard Bennett, the famous star, as a token of esteem. The watch is a gold one and on the back is engraved the inscription, "T. R., A Good Old Soul. R. B." Mr. Ricketts says he never received a gift that he valued as highly as he does this token from Mr. Bennett.

A girl in Glasgow, Scotland, writes Kathlyn Williams of Seligs and asks: "Do you hypnotize the leopard before you fondle it, or merely chloroform it?" If the young lady in question had seen this same leopard endeavor to take a large bite out of Miss Williams' head, she would probably alter her viewpoint.

Labor Story Filmed by Famous Players

H. B. Warner Featured

THE first picture to be released under the Paramount banner is "The Lost Paradise" and it deserves to be ranked among the best of the Famous Players' productions. It is a forceful story of the struggle between an ironmaster and his down-trodden laboring men who want to be recognized as human beings with hearts, souls and feelings instead of just as mechanical parts of the factory's wheels of progress.

It contains many big scenes of the iron works showing the blowers and furnaces in action, which are worked into, and become important features in, the story. One of the strongest and most gripping points of the picture is where the shop committeeman calls the strike by waving a handkerchief from the office balcony. It is a tense moment and the spectator is held in doubt just a second then slowly the wheels and belts cease motion. By a special permit from E. H. Gary this and several other scenes were taken in one of his big steel mills, thus securing the best in realism and atmosphere.

H. B. Warner plays the leading role as Reuben

Labor and capital meet

Warren, the young superintendent of the Knowlton Steel and Iron Works, and does it admirably. Catherine Carter as the sweet, generous Margaret Knowlton has the only generally popular role in the cast. She, alone, is admired and loved by both factions. Arthur Hoops is seen as the egotistic "heavy," Ralph Standish. The work of the cast supporting these three is excellent. One of the truest characterizations of all is that of the old man who knows he is being treated unfairly by his employer but is afraid to resist because of the children dependent upon his scant wages. While employed in Dr. Standish's laboratory Reuben Warren invents a volta dynamo. The doctor presents the drawings to the ironmaster, Knowlton, who readily agrees that it is a practical and valuable invention. That night Dr. Standish is killed by an explosion in his laboratory, and in the fire which follows many drawings are destroyed one of which is that of the volta dynamo.

Knowlton takes advantage of the outline of the new dynamo drawn for him by Dr. Standish, secures a patent on it, and manufactures it as his own. Warren realizes that he is being robbed but is unable to prevent it. He is in love with Margaret Knowlton but because of the great difference in their stations is restrained from declaring his love to her. Dr. Standish's son, Ralph, is also in love with Margaret, is looked upon favorably by her parents, and finally becomes engaged to her.

Some time later a strike is called at the mills because of the low pay and long hours of the men. About this time the executors of Dr. Standish's property call upon Warren to interpret the doctor's writing which to them is unintelligible. In one of the books he finds an account of the doctor's visit to Knowlton with the plans of his invention, the volta dynamo. The superintendent calls upon his employer with this proof and Knowlton confesses his theft. When Margaret learns of the wrong done Warren she breaks her engagement with young Standish and offers to him the contract that was given to the doctor's son—that of becoming half owner of the Knowlton Steel and Iron Works on the day of his marriage to her. Warren gladly accepts and becomes engaged to Margaret. Under his management as Knowlton's partner, the men are allowed to resume work under humane conditions and a higher rate of pay.

The Straits of Bonifacio.—Pathe. Its swirling waters reflecting curious and changing silhouettes against the sky, the Straits of Bonifacia, in Sardinia, afford one of the most interesting boating trips to be found in Southern Italy.

The Russian Zoo (Osania-Novaq.—Pathe. The Russian Zoo, world famous for its completeness, has some of the most curious and rare animal specimens in captivity. One of the most noted specimens of this kind is the wild horse, the first of its kind ever brought to Europe.

Training Army Dogs, Sweden.—Pathe. Few people indeed thing farther than guns, powder and ball, swords, etc., when army equipment is mentioned. In Sweden, however, not the least of the separate departments of the army is that devoted to the breeding and training of the army dog. For the military service it has been found that the most intelligent and versatile canine is the Airedale terrier. This little animal adopts himself wonderfully to the many tasks and hardships imposed upon him by the military service.

In training the dogs various stunts and devices are resorted to by the army officers to develop the dogs' sense of smell. Crawling, jumping and climbing exercises also form a part of the day's routine. Quite as important as the morning toilet which fits the dog for his arduous day's work in the campaign, is the feeding time at the kennels after a day's strenuous activity.

A Basque Wedding.—Pathe. The wedding ceremonies of the natives of the Province of Basque, which lies in the Pyrenees Mountains near the Bay of Biscay, are peculiarly distinctive. Simple in the extreme without any of the costliness or shaw or honey-mooning of the average ceremony, the Basque bride and groom, after enjoying a hearty breakfast, settle down immediately to quiet married life.

From Grenoble to Aix Les Bains.—Pathe. Who has not heard of the wonderful French Alps? Exquisitely beautiful and quite unsurpassed in grandeur the giant mountains standing on every side of the tourist inspire awe and wonder at the accomplishments of nature. One of the most interesting of the many trips through this section is that from Grenoble to Aix Les Bains. Along the road one gets an excellent opportunity to observe the intricate and characteristic basic formations of the mountains.

At Sierroz the waterfalls and cataracts, resplendent in rainbow glory, are the common meeting place of all travelers. But one of the most beautiful and picturesque spots in all France is to be found at Lake Bourget. From the old side wheel steamer which makes excursion trips about the lake one is enabled to secure a magnificent view of the surrounding country.

The Art of the Furrier.—Pathe. Mole skins so eagerly sought by the fashionable customer are prepared for the market by the hunter who frequently makes his entire livelihood from the sale of the pelts of these little animals. A simple but effective device is used to catch the mole. It consists of a snare made of a noose attached to a rod bent to form a spring. As he inspects his snares the mole-hunter finds several of them sprung. Taking the mole out he quickly kills it and skins it. He then spreads it open and tacks it to a small board where it soon becomes stiff and dry.

Before they can be used commercially the mole skins have to be treated chemically to soften and preserve them. After they are thoroughly dried the furrier trims them and joins them together in long strips. These are matched together according to the various shades and then shaped into various garments. The rich fine fur lined with costly silks and satins betokens but little its humble origin.

Cairo—The Capital of Egypt.—Pathe. Cairo, the wonderful city of the ancient as well as the modern Egyptians. The panoramic view from the Citadel bridges the narrow congested streets and the quaint stone buildings as they stretch back as far as the eye can see like a great white sheet to the very shores of the river Nile. The tombs of the Khalifs, specimens of early architecture, attract the tourist. In ancient times when the city Cairo was walled for defense, ponderous iron gates closed out the stranger and warrior. The traveler still passes through these ponderous doors, not without, however, a feeling of awe and wonder. The great Citadel, built in 1166, is used by the English for governmental purposes. In it are to be found the Viceroy's residence, the arsenal, the mint and the public offices. Mosques, Arab cafes, public parks and military barracks, all reflect the peculiar life of the Egyptian, the Cairo Egyptian, the descendant of one of the oldest and powerful nations of the ancient world.

Rapids and Falls of Trondhjem.—Pathe. Sweden, always interesting for its very ruggedness and severity, for its magnificent forested hills and its deep narrow rocky valleys, has some of the most beautiful rivers in the world. Swedish streams are beautiful because they are different. Clear, cold water, foaming and churning in the narrow gorges, splashing wildly over hundreds of precipices, and down countless series of rocky steps, the Rapids and falls of the Trondhjem are typical of the great rivers of Sweden. No languid, quiet flowing mud saturated stream is the Trondhjem, but bright and flashing, crystal here, rainbow there, it is up and doing the work of a million men in supplying power and lighting for hundreds of mills and factories and towns throughout its entire length. While its cataracts are wonderful, it is the greater falls of the Trondhjem that rival the greater waterfalls of the world.

Heroine Escapes Death in Wreck

Thanhouser Serial Exciting

THRILLS galore abound in the eleventh installment of Thanhouser's "Million Dollar Mystery" serial, which is entitled "In the Path of the Fast Express." In the early part of the first reel a spectacular train wreck will set the audience gasping and the second thousand feet provides another thrill in a scene where James Cruse, the hero, in the role of Jim Norton, is bound to the railroad track while in the distance we see the fast express approaching. Florence reaches her lover too late to cut the ropes which bind him and drag him from the track, so, instead, she hurries to a nearby switch and sidetracks the express train and then returns to release Norton.

Norton fought grimly with the conspirators.

Of course Braine, the leader of the Black Hundred, and Countess Olga, the adventuress of the story, are strongly in evidence throughout the entire picture and as usual they are busy plotting ways in which to obtain information as to the whereabouts of the missing million dollars, although, as the picture ends, they seem to be as far away from the accomplishment of their evil purpose as they were when the picture series began.

The wreck scene in part one of the eleventh installment is splendid in many respects. The interior of the Pullman car is absolutely convincing, and through the windows one can obtain vague glimpses of the passing scenery, but in the scene where the wreck occurs is to be found the one weak spot of this reel, since the mere falling of the players to the floor of the car does not realistically indicate what has happened. The exteriors, however, in which a real wreck is shown and close-up views given of the wrecking crew at work, are above criticism and hold one spellbound while they are on the screen.

Florence hears the plot to kill Norton.

Jim Norton and Florence Gray, who in part ten of the picture have escaped from a tramp freighter, are seen in the opening of part eleven about to board a train for New York, since Norton is anxious to return Florence to her home in the city.

Just as the train pulls out of the station, Braine, who in part ten had been left bound and gagged aboard the freighter, makes his appearance but too late to board the departing train. Since Braine is sure both Florence and Norton are aboard the train, he hastens to a telegraph office and sends a wire to Countess Olga, explaining how he missed the train and urging her and others of the conspirators to board the train as it passes a point farther down the line.

Countess Olga is next shown receiving the message and she immediately sets out with a male escort to meet Florence and Norton, hoping that some lucky turn of fortune's wheel will place them both again within the power of the conspirators. Olga and her escort arrive at their destination in plenty of time to intercept the limited, and when the train pulls in, Olga and her friend take seats in the same Pullman and the countess quickly intrudes upon the tete a tete of Florence and Norton.

The three are intent upon their conversation when suddenly there is a crash and all is oblivion. The train is wrecked and all the passengers are hurled to the floor or doubled up in their seats. Vroon, the conspirator who escorted Countess Olga, is fortunate enough to escape with but a few scratches and, seeing Florence unconscious on the floor of the Pullman car, he decides fate has given him the very opportunity he sought, so taking Florence in his arms he makes his way out of the wreckage.

Climbing the railroad embankment and pushing his way through some woods which border the track, he comes out upon a little lane, just as a farmer is driving up in a buggy. A small bill changes hands and Vroon is able to place Florence in the farmer's rig and drive away. He takes her to a lonely cabin in the woods, where others of the conspirators are living, and though Florence has by now returned to consciousness and fights grimly against being carried within the cabin, the men are able to drag her into the little room and to bind her securely to a chair.

Meanwhile Norton has recovered from the shock he sustained when the train left the track and, beholding Olga unconscious on the floor of the car, he gathers her into his arms and climbs out of the wreckage. All about him other dazed and injured passengers are emerging from the wreck and already help has been summoned and a wrecking crew is beginning its work of clearing away the debris.

Placing Olga against a tree near the track, Norton returns to the wreck to seek Florence. Quickly he discovers that she is missing and also that Olga's companion is no longer in sight. He jumps to the conclusion that Olga's friend must have been one of the conspirators and has, most likely, taken Florence away to some hiding place of the Black Hundred. Hastening then to the car where the wrecking crew has established a temporary telegraph office, Norton sends a wire to his friends of the police department, telling them that Florence has again been kidnapped and urging that they send out a party at once to scour the country.

Returning again to Olga, Norton carries her to a nearby farm house where she can receive medical assistance, and, borrowing a horse, sets out to see if he can obtain any clues as to the direction taken by Florence's kidnapper. He is sighted from a distance by Vroon and the conspirators, and the band sets forth to ambush him. While Norton is riding quietly down a country lane the conspirators leap upon him and overpower him, and bear him away to the same cabin in which Florence is confined. They threaten him with death and tell Florence she can save him if she will reveal the hiding place of the million dollars—a thing which Florence is unable to do, since she does not know it.

Greatly to Florence's alarm Norton is then dragged forth by the conspirators and tied to the railroad track, in the path of the fast express which is due in a few minutes. The girl struggles with her bonds but it is not until she kicks out a window pane with her feet, and saws the ropes apart with the bits of jagged glass, that she is finally able to escape.

Immediately she is free, Florence rushes out to the right of way, side-tracks the coming express train and then releases Norton from his dangerous position on the tracks.

Meanwhile the squad of policemen summoned by Norton have arrived at a station near the scene of the wreck and hurry down the track toward the place of the disaster. They suddenly perceive ahead of them a band of men attacking a man and a girl. Rushing up, they discover Norton and Florence beset on all sides by the conspirators. The coming of the police results of course in the rescue of Florence and Norton and the arrest of many of the conspirators but, unfortunately, Vroon and several of the other ringleaders escape in the confusion.

Following their rescue, Norton, accompanied by Florence, sets out on a handcar to make his way into New York, and the police take their prisoners to the nearby station, there to await the coming of a train which will bear them all back to the city.

Newman Plants Busy

The Newman Manufacturing Company, which operates three factories in Cincinnati, Ohio, New York, N. Y., and Chicago, Ill., where it manufactures brass frames, railings, easels, etc., reports excellent business and is running full capacity. This is cheering information, in view of the general conditions now in existence throughout the country. The Western, Central and Southern states particularly are showing marked improvement in business conditions, and the Eastern and New England states will come along in due time. It is remarkable the number of new theaters which are now in the course of construction. S. J. Newman, secretary of the firm, who has a wide acquaintance among theater owners, reports that the majority are of the impression that business conditions will show a great improvement this coming fall.

Wonderful New Pathe Lens

The New York Sun of Sunday, August 16, in a long and interesting article, discusses the chances which the camera men will have in the present European war, and expresses the opinion that the difficulties in the way of securing first-class pictures will be greater than ever before, because of the unbending hostility on the part of the combatants toward both photographers and correspondents.

It states that if first-class pictures are secured it will probably be with such a telephoto lens as the new one of Pathe Freres, which can take a photograph of a man at 600 yards so big that he will fill the plate. The Sun further says that only one of these wonderful lenses has yet been made, and that it is the property of Pathe Freres. As the limit of the ordinary lens is about 200 feet, the possibilities of the new lens are understood when it is remembered that most of the fighting is done at ranges of 1,000 to 400 yards. So, with a lens capable of taking pictures at from 600 to 800 yards, the operator could get pictures of the hottest fighting, an opportunity lacking to the man with an ordinary lens.
